The administration's policy regarding the war in Europe was clarified in some degree by President Roosevelt's reply to Premier Reynaud of France. At Charlottesville the President had pledged the United States to "extend to the opponents of force the material resources of his Nation." His message to M. Reynaud was even more emphatic in promising aid to the Allies. But he also pointed out that his statement carried "no implication of military commitments."

Two purposes appear to have inspired the safeguarding clause. No doubt the President wished to allay the fears of critics who believe that he is leading the United States close to the brink of war. And he probably wished to warn the French against expecting unlimited aid from the United States. It is questionable, however, whether his message accomplished either purpose.

Taken as a whole, the cable to M. Reynaud gives assurance to the French that as long as they continue to fight "materials and supplies will be sent them from the United States in ever increasing quantities and kinds." Actually the President has no authority to make such commitments. American ships are forbidden by the Neutrality Act to carry supplies to belligerents. Should Allied shipping prove inadaquate to the task of transporting American war supplies abroad, the President's pledge would break down.

It is well to remember that the Allies are now purchasing and hauling away in their own ships all the supplies obtained from the United States. When and if their cash is exhausted this supply of American equipment will be cut off, unless Congress modifies the Johnson Act. President Roosevelt's message to the French Premier might easily be interpreted as a pledge to grant the Allies credit when and if they need it. Here again his promise appears to have outrun his authority.

Loose assertions of this sort do not serve the interests of either the United States or the Allies. On the one hand, they encourage opposition to the American policy of permitting the Allies to obtain valuable war materials here. The American people are overwhelmingly in sympathy with the Allied cause. But they are also overwhelmingly opposed to participation in the war. There is real danger that vague commitments on the part of the President, which seem to ignore this other facet of American policy, may retard the program of aiding the Allies within the framework of legislation now on the books or on the way toward approval.

Last week former Governor Landon criticized the implication in Mr. Roosevelt's Charlottesville speech that recent events have brought this country nearer to a state of belligerency: "It would be cruel indeed," he said, "to arouse false hopes in nations that are fighting for their existence." On Saturday night Colonel Lindbergh sharpened the point by saying, "We have been doing to England and France what they did to Abyssinia, to Czechoslovakia, to Poland, to Finland, and to Norway. We have encouraged them to hope for help we cannot send."

The plain truth, of course, is in accord with Mr. Landon's statement that "Congress has not the slightest notion of declaring war." National sympathy, as the Republican leader says, is wholly with the Allies. Public opinion also favors "going the limit for national defense." But it would be very misleading to conclude from this conjunction that any sizable or important element is actively favoring American entry into the war.

The last Gallup poll on the subject, released the end of May, showed a 13-to-1 majority against this course. If there has been any pronounced change in the attitude then revealed, it has not reflected itself in any clear-cut congressional action. Opinion in that body certainly favors all aid to the Allies which is not fundamentally inconsistent with maintenance of neutrality. But more than that cannot be claimed.

The Allies' predicament today stems from overindulgence in false hopes. Certainly the United States cannot ease the distress of other democratic countries by extending the fog of illusions. It is time to look realities in the face. And that requires a clearer distinction than has yet been drawn between the material aid we are able to give the Allies and any thought of American participation in the war.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I ask also that an editorial from the Washington Daily News of today, entitled "Empty Guns and Adjectives," be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Washington Daily News, June 17, 1940]

EMPTY GUNS AND ADJECTIVES

Colonel Lindbergh warns of our drift toward war and Chairman KEY PITTMAN, of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, answers under the title, "Colonel Lindbergh's Misconception of Our Foreign Policy."

While there are many arguable phases in our foreign policy, one stark reality stands out, about which there can be no misconception. It is that we are not now—or for a long time to come—prepared to enter a war. Not even a fourth-class war, as Representative BRUCE BARTON put it, speaking on the same day as Lindbergh.

Facts about our military inadequacy, brought out in recent days from the heads of our own armed agencies, give eloquent testimony that a declaration of war now means nothing less than national suicide.

It is well, therefore, and timely, that the week end brought forth such sharp warnings as those which came from Lindbergh and BARTON.

Both are for unstinted defense preparation. But both are realists as to our present predicament. And both being the sort that the public listens to, they have contributed much to a cooling off of the hotheads who of late have been yelling for war, regardless.

"Our present danger results from making gestures with an empty gun," says Lindbergh.

"This," says BARTON, "is a time when words are useless. Only deeds count. If words could win, then the vituperation of Secretary Ickes poured out on Hitler last year would have blown him to pieces. If calling names did any good, then Mussolini would have crawled into his hole and died of shame after hearing the President's Charlottesville speech.

"Our present job is not denunciation but production. The less Hitler hears from our politicians, and the more he hears from our factories, the better. Weapons are the only language he can understand."

We trust that those who are whooping it up to "stop Hitler now" will give heed to that hard common sense and wake up to the fact that you can't smash a tank with an adjective.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Finally, I wish to read one sentence from the testimony of George Wharton Pepper, the distinguished former Senator from the great State of Pennsylvania, who testified before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in the neutrality hearings of last fall. I read one sentence from Senator Pepper's testimony:

It would be a tragic thing if, as a result of our utterances, they—were to assume commitments which otherwise they would not assume, and plunge into war for the sake of consistency and honor, and were to turn to us to make good what they understood our assurances to be, and thus put us in a position where we would either have to smilingly explain that we never had any intention of being taken so seriously or else ourselves plunge into a war which we would not approve either as respects its necessity or its wisdom.

Mr. President, that is a sentence which ought to be burned into the conscience of the Congress and the White House. Indeed, I conclude with a fervent recommendation of the fundamental axiomatic philosophy of the first Roosevelt, who said that we should "speak softly and carry a big stick."

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Because of the importance of this question, and of the address now about to be made, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Danaher	King	Reynolds
Andrews	Davis	La Follette	Russell
Ashurst	Donahey	Lee	Schwartz
Austin	Downey	Lodge	Schwellenbach
Bailey	Ellender	Lucas	Sheppard
Bankhead	George	Lundeen	Shipstead

Clark, Mo.	Hughes	Radcliffe	Wiley
Connally	Johnson, Colo.	Reed

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, the United States of America, as a nation, stands today in military preparedness just about where the French and English nations stood 2 years ago, 3 years ago, 4 years ago, 5 years ago, and so on; that is, those nations were faced with an emergency and the parliaments of both nations knew that the emergency was coming. The emergency drew closer, and finally both those nations, due to a lack of desire to face realities, to face facts, were confronted with the actual emergency, and we know the sorrowful tale from that time on. The United States of America today is in the same position. It, too, is approaching an emergency, not alone one of national defense and independence but a financial emergency.

We have had an emotional spree in this country during the last 5 or 6 weeks; our emotions have run riot. Men have said all manner and kind of things; have thrown down all manner and kind of gauntlets; have taken all manner and kind of positions on internal and external affairs without any consideration as to whether or not they could back up their assertions if the need to back them up occurred.

I am reminded now of the years from 1920 to 1929. What a wonderful period of prosperity that was. No one seemed to care about government; no one cared much about anything, except the making of money; but one day, in the latter part of 1929, after the speculative spree had somewhat worn off, we found we were beginning to enter a period of darkness and depression. During the period from 1920 to 1929 the people of the United States, through various banking organizations, loaned $14,000,000,000 of good American money to foreign governments and subdivisions thereof, and with the money which was thus loaned foreign governments and subdivisions thereof were buying from us more than they had ever before bought in the history of the world, and we were selling them our goods and receiving in payment therefor the money which we had loaned to them with which to buy the goods. Finally the loans stopped, and that was one of the contributing factors which brought the country to a state of grim reality that the prosperity was largely artificial.

We then went into the depression, and from 1929 down to date, in varying degrees, we have sought to deal with the depression. The main way of dealing with a depression is always money. So, for 10 long years, our chief means of handling the problems of the depression—and understandably so—has been by the appropriation of money. It is very seldom that anybody has seen fit to mention that we did not have the money; that perhaps the depression would last longer than had been anticipated; that perhaps new circumstances in this everyday, workaday, realistic world would alter the facts upon which we were proceeding; and that perhaps it might be wise to try to pay somewhat as we went along the roadway and to relate expenditures to income. But always there was to be an $80,000,000,000 country next year or a $90,000,000,000 country next year, or a $100,000,000,000 country next year, and the debt would take care of itself. We are now about to get over that emotional spree; we are now about to face the fact that all we have spent and all we have borrowed, in addition, must finally be paid for not by the rich, for there are not enough of them if all the property they had should be taken, but by the sweat and toil and worry of every common laborer, every ordinary farmer, every fisherman, every railroad man, and every automobile worker. They are the people now whose perspiration will manufacture the dollars which will have to go into the National Treasury to meet the bill.

During the last 5 or 6 weeks we have been greatly concerned with the national defense. We had a good peace spree, which lasted for a number of years. We could not visualize that it was necessary to have national defense in this country. It looked as if wars would be so silly; it looked as if they would be so senseless—and they are—and that they would be so wasteful—and they are—that it would be inconceivable that there would be any need for an army or a navy. During the last 5 or 6 weeks we have had a most rude awakening.

Before we come to the financial picture let us review what is ahead of the country in a military, naval, and international way. As I stand on the floor here, it appears as if the French Army has capitulated completely—complete and unconditional surrender. France as a belligerant has gone. What may happen to the French Navy none of us know. Will it fall into the hands of Germany? We do not know.

Will the French ships join the English Fleet and continue to fight? That we do not know. Assuming that the French Fleet falls into the hands of Hitler and Mussolini, the German, Italian, and French Fleets together will equal and surpass, to a small degree, the English Fleet. So that the English fleet on paper will then be no better than the equal of the combined fleet. France is now out of the picture, and we are all looking for the next attack to come on Great Britain.

The British Fleet has three bases in Great Britain. All three of those bases are on the English Channel and the North Sea; that is, they are on the eastern side of Great Britain. She has no fleet bases on the western shore of Great Britain. The attack upon Great Britain in all probability, certainly if the French Fleet comes over and joins the British Fleet, will be by sea and by air rather than by land troops. Perhaps that campaign will be to starve into submission the people in the British Isles.

The Germans have about 150 submarines which have not been operating during the past 5 or 6 weeks. They are being held back and reconditioned and rebased as a part of the new offensive on Great Britain. The air fleet will likewise be moved to bases in Norway, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, and France, and likewise will attack all British shipping going up the English Channel or the North Sea, or around on the western side of the British Isles. Certainly it will be very difficult for the British Fleet to use the 3 bases on the eastern coast of Great Britain, because there the naval vessels will be subjected to submarine attack and to air attack with more facility than if they were on the western coast.

About 30 percent of all the food Great Britain has must pass through the Port of London. If that port is shut off, it will be necessary to divert the food up the western coast of Great Britain if the people are not to starve. Every vessel that comes to the British Isles and every vessel that leaves the British Isles will undoubtedly be the target, insofar as possible, of a German submarine or a German air bomb.

So it is perfectly possible that if the French Fleet falls into German hands, first of all, with that fleet the Germans may even try a land invasion; and certainly if the French Fleet falls into the hands of the British the Germans will still be in a position to wage, with some promise of success, an attack upon the British Isles intended to starve that country into submission.

I have no doubt that the British will fight violently. I have no doubt at all that they will do everything humanly possible to defend the British Isles, and they may succeed in withstanding such an assault. They, with their Navy, may still be able to resist attack, and England may not fall; but I am assuming for the purpose of this remark—and we must make all kinds of assumptions; we must have in mind all sorts of possibilities, as well as probabilities, when we legislate—that Great Britain may, in spite of her valiant resistance, finally succumb. What then will happen to the British Fleet?

Certainly the British Fleet and the French Fleet and the Italian Fleet and the German Fleet, if we do not add any others—and I can think of still others—will constitute a very formidable fleet. Our fleet is in the Pacific. Who knows what combinations of countries are likely to find themselves together before this great holocaust is over? We have already seen Russia and Germany go together and divide up Poland. No man knows what divisions and combinations will be made. For the moment Italy and Germany are in a combination, and, in my judgment, will divide up at least a part of the land now under the French flag. Certainly if the British and the French Fleets should get into German hands, and they should want to come over on this side of the Atlantic and bother us, our fleet would be pretty well occupied—being only the size of that of Great Britain—in fighting off the English, the French, the Italian, and the German Fleets together, particularly if other powers not now in the combination should get into it. If that happens we shall have plenty to think about, because the Germans know just as well as you and I know that we have not a great number of military airplanes. They know, probably more accurately than do 90 percent of the Members of Congress, all that we have and all that we have not, because it is their business to know; and their efficiency up to this time indicates that the Germans and the Italians, and all the other countries for that matter, pretty well do know about our state of defense.

A number of persons are writing me letters, and they want me to do this, and they want me to do that. Personally, I am not anxious to commit this country to a course of action which I do not think the country can make good. Defending the United States here is one thing. Defending the United States somewhere else, away off from here, is another thing. It seems to me our attention is going to be pretty well occupied for the next year in seeing that we are able to defend the United States right here.

I do not want anyone to assume that I do not favor aid to the Allies within proper limits, such as selling surplus material which our own forces do not need. I do not want to be critical of that policy. I do not want to be anti-British or anti-French, because my sympathies and my thoughts and my prayers are all with them. At the same time, I want to be pro-American as well as sympathetic to these other countries. Therefore, it seems to me we have need for a much more realistic view than has been indicated by many of the emotional outbursts that have been made, no matter how righteous they may have been, no matter how well they might have expressed what was in my heart, because they did.

Our duty, too, is to think where we are going to be in all this situation, and whether or not we have this, that, and the other thing that we ought to have before we carry an empty gun somewhere and try to hold up somebody with it, particularly when the other fellow knows it is empty much better, perhaps, than we know it is empty.

That is only a brief picture of possibilities. I do not say any of them will happen. I am not even saying today that they are probabilities. I am saying that they are within the fair range of possibilities; and certainly, predicated on past history, they are not as impossible as they looked 2 months ago, or even 2 weeks ago, or even 2 days ago, or even 2 hours ago.

I think we ought to come to a sense of realities in this country. What are the realities? The realities are that we shall have to work as hard as we possibly can, we shall have to utilize every possible agency, first of all, to put this country in a state of adequate defense, which it is not in at the present time. It is not going to be enough to pass some appropriation bills. It is going to require the cooperation of industrialists, labor, the Congress, the Executive, the Army, the Navy, and all parts of our population. More than that, we have a great weapon in the whole international situation about which, up to this time, I have seen or heard very little, and that is the weapon of food, which may permit the United States, if it has the vision and wisdom and foresight, to play a greater role than any other thing I know of toward bringing justice and democracy back to the countries from which it may possibly be taken; for after this war is over—indeed, this very winter, whether or not it is over—there is bound to be in Europe the most tremendous famine of which we can possibly conceive.

It is impossible to take 20,000,000 men away from production, away from the farms, and put them in munition plants or in the Army, and have everybody eating in countries which do not produce sufficient food to feed themselves in the first place, without running short of food. If the United States has the food—and it has it—and if the hunger is severe—and it is going to be severe—if the United States takes a long-headed role, it may have a bigger opportunity to bring order and liberty and justice back to the world than through any other agency. I speak of the agency of food because when the snow flies, even though Germany be victorious, there will be hungry people there who have not food. There will be hungry people in Poland, and in France, and in England, and in Italy, and in every other country in Europe, because no European or Asiatic country is in position to furnish sufficient food for the nations concerned.

What does all that indicate? Picture for a moment the ruin over there, the devastation that has followed in the wake of war, the tearing down of buildings and bridges, the disruption of railroads, the blowing up of canals, and the thousands of other things that enter into the everyday life of the people. Then picture all of these men going home, if the war comes to a quick conclusion; picture the cancelation of munitions contracts in this country; picture the widespread world depression that will exist, together with the extremely large expenditures for armaments which we have made and will continue to make in the face of developing world conditions; and think of what we propose to do about it. We propose, in this tax bill, not to raise sufficient money to pay in full our peacetime expenditures. There is no question about that. Not a dollar in this tax bill will go for future national defense. Even if we take the bill as it is written, with the amendment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], which adds somewhat to its ability to pay our debts, even then it will not pay all the other expenses of Government outside of the cost of the Army and Navy; and here is the proof, right over here on the wall of the Senate Chamber.

For the past 10-year period our average yearly expenditures have been $7,300,000,000. For that 10-year period each year the Government has received about $4,600,000,000. That means that in each of the 10 years which have passed it has spent $2,700,000,000 which it did not have.

Let us consider the deficit of $2,700,000,000 a year. How much have our Army and Navy cost us a year for each year during the past 10 years? One billion one hundred million dollars a year has been the average cost of our Army and Navy, and if we subtract the average cost of our Army and Navy from our average annual deficit for each of the past 10 years, we find that $1,600,000,000 a year is left over. That is how much we would have to raise if we did not appropriate a cent for the expenditures for the Army and Navy in the past, in the present, or in the future.

The pending measure comes in with $1,007,000,000 of new taxes, and it is estimated that the amendment of the Senator from Virginia will take care of $500,000,000 of additional expenses. So that the total will be about a billion and a half dollars in revenue, or its equivalent, and we would still be $100,000,000 a year short of sufficient money, $1,600,000,000, to pay for the ordinary routine expenses of the Government, without a sou marque going for any past war or present war or any possible future war.

Mr. President, that is the way we are preparing for this emergency, just as we prepared for the depression from 1920 to 1929—not at all—just as during the whole depression we prepared for this international emergency—not at all—and just as now we are beginning, not to prepare for the greater depression, the greater emergency, which is sure to come as an aftermath following the World War.

Then it is proposed that we go home next Saturday, and when it all comes back on us, the people are going to say, "Why didn't you get up on the floor of the Senate and tell them that?" Just as if there have not been men on the floor of the Senate for 20 years who told the people that this economic set-up would bring on the depression in the world, who told them from 1929 to 1940 that war clouds were gathering on the international horizon, and that we should prepare, and who are now attempting to tell them that tremendous international depression clouds of a financial nature are even closer than either one of these other two things were when the warning was first issued, and that we should prepare now. Yet someone will say 2 or 3 years from now when we are appropriating $800,000,000 or $1,763,000,000 for relief for this, that, or the other thing, as we will be, "Why didn't you fellows tell us that?"

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I hope I am not interrupting the tenor of the Senator's observations.

Mr. TYDINGS. Not at all.

Mr. KING. I wonder whether the Senator has dwelt upon the loss of foreign markets which we have already sustained, and the greater loss which will be inevitable if the Hitler regime triumphs and destroys France, and, of course, makes it impossible for Great Britain to become one of the great purchasers of our surplus commodities.

Mr. TYDINGS. I touched on it briefly, but I shall be glad to give an illustration. In normal years we shipped to foreign countries about $5,000,000,000 worth of our products. In normal years our national income, we will say, is about $70,000,000,000, roughly. What does that mean? It means that about 7 percent of all we produce in this country from the farm, factory, mine, and forest is sold abroad, and therefore it means that 7 percent of all the people who work in this country are working to produce things, not for consumption at home, but to be shipped beyond our frontiers. It means that when that market is gone that 7 percent of our working people will be unemployed.

In normal times about 50,000,000 people a year are employed in this country, and 7 percent of 50,000,000 people would be 3,500,000 working people who would be thrown out of work, and their unemployment would in turn result in others being thrown out of work, others who are dependent upon their earnings and the expenditures in other lines to keep the wheels of industry turning. That is just a sidelight, I may say to the able Senator from Utah, as he himself has often said on the floor of the Senate, of one of the things which is bound to contribute to the emergency.

I do not wish to use intemperate language, but really to me it seems absolutely criminal—and there is no other word for it—for Congress to adjourn next Saturday, as I understand is proposed, go home, and leave this financial condition to confront the people of this country, as it will confront them within 12 months after we go home.

There is absolutely not a cent of appropriation or taxes in the pending measure which will pay for past preparedness, leaving out of consideration present or future preparedness. Indeed, even with this tax bill we will not raise enough money to take care of the ordinary routine expenditures outside of defense for a single year since June 30, 1930, 10 years ago. Yet it is called a defense-tax measure.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. What would the Senator think of a motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Finance with instructions to revamp the whole tax system?

Mr. TYDINGS. I would support the Senator in such a move, and I think it would be a healthy thing for Congress to do.

Mr. MILLER. That is the remedy.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is the best remedy. First of all, most of the taxes provided for in the bill will not be collected this year; they will not be collected until March 15, 1941, unless some amendment changing the present set-up is offered and agreed to. There are some excise taxes which would be collected this year, but we could take that part of the tax bill and pass it, and recommit the remainder of the tax question to the Committee on Finance, and let them write a real tax bill.

Does anyone believe that the world situation is half so bad as I painted it? I think I have painted it rather rosily. Does anyone think that the financial picture is any better than I have painted it? Does anyone think that the aftermath which will follow this great holocaust will be different in degree from the way I have painted it, so that it would be less than necessary to have increased taxes? I am sure no one here would say that any of the statements I have made are extravagant.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me finish this thought, and then I will yield. If my suggestions are not extravagant, who on this floor will suggest a better time in our history to raise our revenues to meet our expenditures than right now, before the aftermath of the war engulfs the economic life of this country? If we cannot do it now, we never will do it, because the years ahead will be darker years, from an economic standpoint, than this year.

I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the observations made today by the very able and distinguished Senator from Maryland, and I also listened to his remarks a few days ago. He has given quite thorough study to the need for additional revenue on the part of the Federal Government, and for retrenchment in expenditures along certain lines. But it is not clear to me what remedy he proposes, whether he is advocating retrenchment of expenditures for purposes other than national defense, or whether he proposes an increase of expenditures for national defense; and to what extent does he think it is necessary, in order to adjust our financial program, that the tax revenues of our Federal Government be increased?

Mr. TYDINGS. I shall be glad to answer the Senator directly. I would advocate, first, either by retrenchment or new taxes, or by both, the paying of the peacetime expenses of the Government. They are $2,700,000,000 a year more than our receipts.

The Senator from Virginia has put into the bill an amendment which would bring about a curtailment of Federal expenditures to the extent of approximately $500,000,000 a year, outside of national defense. So that if we took that $500,000,000 off the $2,700,000,000, we would need $2,200,000,000 of further reductions or new taxes, and we should raise them, because our expenses for a long while are not going to be any less, and our revenues, as we go into the future, are going to be less. So that if we are ever to make this Government pay its way, if we do not do it now, we will face a debacle of more serious consequences than was the depression of 1932. Have I answered the Senator?

Mr. OVERTON. Not altogether. That increase in tax revenue would simply take care of the deficit in the ordinary operating expenses of the Government.

Mr. TYDINGS. Army, Navy, everything, on a peacetime basis.

Mr. OVERTON. On a peacetime basis.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. OVERTON. The Senator has pointed out, and I think very graphically, the absolute necessity of making increased appropriations to take care of our national defense. Are we to do that by increasing the debt limit, or are we to impose additional taxes?

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to start by paying for the national defense too, not in full, but I should like to have the Government make some payment on it. But if I may so state to the able Senator from Louisiana, I know that certainly there can be no excuse, even if we do not pay a single dollar of these emergency expenditures, for not paying at least for all the ordinary peacetime routine expenditures in one of the best years we are likely to have for perhaps 10 years or a whole generation.

Mr. OVERTON. I wish to say—if the Senator will yield to me for a moment further——

Mr. TYDINGS. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. OVERTON. That I am not in disagreement at all with what the able Senator has said——

Mr. TYDINGS. I knew the Senator was not.

Mr. OVERTON. Because I have had occasion to discuss the matter with him at different times. I simply wanted to bring out, as clearly as I could, what specific plan the Senator from Maryland had in view. I thoroughly agree with him that we ought to have greater revenues, and I do not think the bill meets the requirements of our Nation today——

Mr. TYDINGS. That is what I think.

Mr. OVERTON. Either for peacetime operations or in order to provide for an adequate national defense.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is what I think.

Mr. OVERTON. But I believe that possibly the best thing to do would be to pass the pending measure, and that then Congress remain in session, so an additional tax bill may be presented to it which may or may not cover an entire revision of our tax structure.

Mr. TYDINGS. I would accept the suggestion of the Senator from Louisiana with this qualification, that we pass that part of the tax bill which has to do with excise taxes, because every day that that part of the bill fails to operate we lose that much Government revenue. Then I would refer the whole income and other tax questions back to the Finance Committee to revamp.

Mr. BANKHEAD rose.

Mr. TYDINGS. Before I yield to the Senator from Alabama, which I shall in a moment, let me point out that this tax bill, of course, increases everyone's taxes to some extent—particularly income taxes. Let me point out, however, that a man who makes $4,000 a year, who has four children, under this bill would not contribute a single dollar in the way of income taxes toward the expenses of the Government. First of all he would receive $2,000 married-couple's exemption. Then he would get credit for four dependents. That would make $1,600 more. That would make in all $3,600. Then, if he was working, he would get a 10-percent exemption on earned income, which would be $400 more. So that a married man making $4,000 a year, if he had four children, under this bill would not contribute a cent either to the cost of the Government, or the cost of defense, or the cost of future defense. He would not even contribute a $10 bill.

Is that the way to face this emergency? Does anyone think that the picture is so rosy as to permit a man making $4,000 a year completely to escape the payment of any income taxes to the National Government at a time when we have been going nearly $3,000,000,000 a year behind for 10 years? We either have an emergency or we do not have one. Most everyone I have heard talk thinks the world is in bad shape, and that there is a serious emergency. The President says so. Representatives and Senators every day say so. The press says so. Yet in the face of this most devastating situation we allow a man who has an income of $4,000 a year, under this bill, not even to contribute $10 to the cost of the Government. We are going to bar such contribution in the future.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think this would be a good time to use the $2,000,000,000 in gold which the Government now owns and has placed in the stabilization fund, but has never used? It is all there and owned by the Government. Does not the Senator think that in this time of national emergency that money at least should be applied to the extraordinary expenses of the Government?

Mr. TYDINGS. I have not given the matter to which the Senator refers any great thought. It seems to me that the question is a logical one, and without having given it much thought I would say "Yes." But in making the affirmative answer to the Senator's question I am reminded also that the $2,000,000,000 in that fund was borrowed. We did not have that $2,000,000,000.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator is clearly mistaken about that. The $2,000,000,000 was acquired by the Government as the result of the devaluation of the gold we owned. There is no debt against it at all.

Mr. TYDINGS. We could devalue it again and get $6,000,000,000 more, but I would rather finance on a little different scale.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, the Government owns that gold.

Mr. TYDINGS. I know it owns it, because it took it in and promised to pay so much, and gave back less than it promised to pay.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Right or wrong, the Government owns it, and some day must dispose of it. Why not now?

Mr. TYDINGS. I have no objection to that, but I do not want to get into a discussion of that question with the Senator. I would have no objection to that, but it would not change the picture one iota. Even if we should take that gold and spread it over this period of time, we would still be running the peacetime expenditures of the Government at a cost of $2,700,000,000 a year more than was taken in.

The truth is that we have to raise $1,600,000,000 in brand-new money, by new taxes or savings, or the two together in order to pay for our peacetime cost of this Government, without a dollar going to the Army or going to the Navy. That is the picture.

What does this bill do? This bill raises about $1,500,000,000 in savings and new taxes. I commend the chairman of the Finance Committee. I think it has been the finest approach we have had toward a balanced budget, and I know he has worked diligently to try to work out these taxes in the most equitable way.

But the days of easy living, the days of easy taxation, the days of unpreparedness, are gone. Men are dying tonight on the battlefields of France, men died 2 weeks ago on the battlefield of Flanders and Belgium and Holland; men will be dying shortly perhaps on the battlefields of Britain. The old days have passed; but we are proceeding as if the world were just the same today as it was 4 months ago or 4 weeks ago. Of course, just as we are unprepared on land and sea and in the air today, because we put off preparing until the emergency overtook us, so we will be unprepared when this financial avalanche sweeps over this country, causing unemployment, inflation, high cost of living, misery, and want from one end of the country to the other. Now, while we have time to build up our financial breastworks to make ourselves strong and secure, to put our finances on a sound basis, we are doing just what England and France did in a military way. They knew that war was coming, but in London people went on week ends, one week end after another, up until the time that Holland was invaded.

There were sit-down strikes all over France under Mr. Leon Blum, a great liberal, in the face of German preparedness. I shudder to think how much unnecessary blood has been spilt, how many lives have been lost unnecessarily, and how much unnecessary misery has been caused; how many civilians, women and children, and old men have gone down to their deaths, because of that government, which absolutely forestalled the preparation which France needed and had to have, and which that government evaded and set at naught. France might have had 500 or 1,000 or 2,000 more airplanes.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I shall yield in a moment. France might have had 500 or 1,000 more tanks, and these she might have had at some critical point, and perhaps they would have represented the difference between victory and defeat. All those who, with France's day of need coming closer and closer, stopped the production of all the things she had to have to defend herself have blood on their hands today; and their country is gone.

We have done the same thing. There is no man who will rise on the floor of the Congress and justify a sit-down strike. It is absolutely contrary to law, contrary to justice, and contrary to equity. I am as much in favor of labor having a square deal as anyone can be, but when labor stays in a factory and takes the property belonging to another, and in some cases tries to sabotage that property, it does not give the kind of justice which it asks for. When some of us tried to denounce it on this floor, and when we put the question to a vote, there were many, including some members of the President's Cabinet, who said it was not a crime. We all know that to be true.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I wanted to make only one observation, in view of what the Senator said about the Blum regime in France. As I recall, under the Blum regime, he was responsible for the continuation of the building of airplanes for the military and naval forces of that country.

Mr. TYDINGS. Well, he may have been. That is one dim ray of light in a sea of darkness, because, as I recall, under the Blum regime the railroads of France entirely—oh, I thought the Senator made an affirmative statement.

Mr. LUCAS. No; not at all.

Mr. TYDINGS. He asked me a question?

Mr. LUCAS. What I am attempting to do is merely to bolster the Senator's argument. I was about to say that under the Blum regime, in the quiescent attitude which they assumed at that particular time, fearing no one, but going along their peaceful way, he was responsible, so I am informed, for completely stopping the building of military and naval airplanes for the defense of France.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am not in a position definitely to confirm that statement, but I think I can say, within the realm of fact, that certainly the Blum administration, to a large extent, hindered the preparedness of France. That is only typical of democracy. Democracies do not want to save themselves. They do not want to bother about it. They do not want to have to pay taxes. They would rather postpone them as long as possible. They would rather eat their cake and have it too.

Mr. President, democracy today is not a necessity. It is a luxury, and it remains to be seen whether or not we have enough money to afford a luxury like democracy, because democracy is rapidly becoming nonexistent in the world. Do we want to keep this way of life? Every Member of Congress has gone out on Armistice Day, on the Fourth of July, and on Flag Day, to tell about what a wonderful land this is, with free speech, free press, the right to worship God according to the dictates of one's own conscience, the right to trial by jury, the right to habeas corpus, with laws against excessive bail and imprisonment except upon warrant, and so forth. We have said:

> We want to keep our American way of life. When I rise in the morning and see Old Glory coming up and waving its red, white, and blue in the roseate rays of the morning sun I have a thrill, and I thank God I am an American.

Then we come back to the Senate and to the House and see democracy going over the cataract, even though the people themselves are willing to pay the taxes necessary for its preservation. The press of the country is supporting new taxes 100 percent on matters of taxation, and everybody is saying, "We must get ready for this catastrophe." With all that, we cannot obtain enough support in Congress, where the people really function through their representatives, to pay the peacetime expenditures of the Government, exclusive of past, present, or future preparedness. I am asking only that we pay for the peacetime costs of the Federal machine, without a cent going for any preparedness, past, present, or future. If we had had this tax bill, with the Byrd amendment cutting down the expenses $500,000,000, we should still be $100,000,000 a year short of paying the other costs of the Government, for every year since 1930. That is the picture.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Has the Senator some amendments which he desires to offer to the bill?

Mr. TYDINGS. I have.

Mr. HARRISON. We have not made as much progress today as I had hoped. I am in sympathy with the general views expressed by the Senator. No one can be found more cooperative in trying to put through a big tax bill—and this is a pretty big tax bill. We may differ in the amounts to be raised, but I hope the Senator will let us get down to considering this bill, and if he has any amendments to offer, let us vote on them, so that we may make some progress today.

Mr. TYDINGS. I wish to lay a little foundation for the amendments, Mr. President, because I know that if I offer them without the foundation, they will blow right over the desk, and I cannot do anything about it.

I feel that what the people of the country want, and what they have a right to expect—aye, demand—is that any tax bill which passes this Congress at the present time shall pay at least for the normal routine expenditures of the Government, exclusive of national defense. Certainly, during the past 10 years, for each and every year we have spent $2,700,000,000 more than we have taken in. For each of the past 10 years our Army and Navy have cost $1,100,000,000 a year. That leaves $1,600,000,000 a year for each of the past 10 years for which we had no money. Even with the new bill we shall still be $100,000,000 short of raising enough to pay for the peacetime expenditures of the Government, without a cent going for any of the cost of the Army and Navy, for the past 10 years, for the present, or for the future.

Mr. President, just so surely as that the sun rises and sets, whether this is a short war or a long one, whether Hitler wins it all or wins only a part of it, whether we are attacked or whether we escape attack, there will be international depression, starvation, pestilence, disease, disruption of world trade, bitterness, malice, new kinds of ideologies, and new methods employed; and we shall need every dollar of credit and every bit of sound finance of which a democracy is capable to weather the storm. Make no mistake about it. I predict that in January or February, if not before, we shall appropriate sums like $100,000,000, $200,000,000, or $250,000,000 to feed the starving and pestilence-ridden people of Asia, Europe, and perhaps Africa. We shall all vote for it; and we shall be feeding our own, too. Make no mistake about it. We cannot escape the consequences of this war, even if we escape actual involvement in it, any more than we escaped the consequences of the last World War, which did not overtake us until about 9 or 10 years after the war was over, by the device of lending to our bankrupt customers sufficient money to keep the flow of goods moving during the period from the close of the war until the depression began. That device was all that postponed the depression.

I remember well the depression of 1921. There was quite a long period when work was very slack and when conditions were very bad, but the lending policy of our people then stepped in and lent our customers the money to buy our goods. There will be no such policy after this war, because we have gone down that road, and we know that it is only a blind alley. I cannot conceive that we would go down it again.

In what year in the future, insofar as we can now see, will this country be in a better position than it now is to pay for its peacetime expenditures, outside the Army and Navy? Will the year 1941 be a better year? Will the year 1942 be likely to be a better year? Will 1943, 1944, 1945, 1946, 1947, 1948, 1949, or 1950 be a better year? I doubt it. It will be a long while before we see another year as economically beneficial to the people of this country as the year 1940.

If that is the probability, as well as the possibility, then, in heaven's name, why put off paying for our ordinary peacetime expenditures, at a time when we can better pay them, to a time when we cannot pay them as well, and do so in the name of democracy? Democracy went to pieces in 1929 because it would not prepare. Democracy went to pieces on the fields of France and other countries of Europe recently because it would not prepare. Shall the last stronghold of democracy go to pieces here because we will not financially prepare? The danger is sure to come.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. We have under consideration a bill which seeks to raise $1,007,000,000.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. How much would the Senator increase it. I wish to follow up that question by asking him how he would raise the increased amount?

Mr. TYDINGS. I have three amendments which would raise $400,000,000, and I do not expect any of them to be adopted.

Mr. HARRISON. What are those amendments?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I should like to ask the Senator why he is offering them? If he feels that way about it, why does he want to waste the time of the Senate and the Congress?

Mr. TYDINGS. I am hoping that by giving the Senate this bit of what we know is the truth I can at least save the country from the fate which has just overtaken France, and perhaps have some of the amendments adopted.

Mr. HARRISON. What are the amendments?

Mr. TYDINGS. One amendment would reduce the exemptions to $800 for a single man—as the bill now before the Senate has reduced it—and to $1,600 a year for a married man without children.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator allow anything for dependents?

Mr. TYDINGS. Oh, yes. The $400 for each dependent would remain the same; but I am now talking about a married man with no dependents. I believe that a married man with no dependents, if he knew that all the rich were to be taxed enormously all the way up, would be willing to give the Government $10 a year; and if every such man should give the Government $10 a year, the total would be something like $150,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. That is $150,000,000 on that amendment?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. What is the other amendment?

Mr. TYDINGS. I would lower the bracket where the surtax begins on the well-to-do from $4,000 a year down to the exemption of $2,500 a year. If that were done and the surtax started at $2,500 on incomes running all the way up to a million or more dollars a year, that would raise another $100,000,000 a year.

Mr. HARRISON. In other words, the Senator does not think that a man in the higher-income brackets who now pays 79 percent normal tax and surtax is paying quite enough?

Mr. TYDINGS. I am sorry he is paying any at all; but let me say to the Senator——

Mr. HARRISON. I merely want to understand what is the Senator's position.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me answer the Senator. I stood on this floor for 7 years and in season and out fought the extravagance of Congress, and now I have to stand on this floor, having voted against that extravagance, and fight for the taxes to pay for it. In other words, I am on the unpopular end both times. When expenditures were popular nearly everyone voted for them except the Senator now speaking and a half a dozen or more others. Now when a tax measure is before us—and taxes are always unpopular—the same Senator who voted against the extravagance has now got to stand here and fight for the taxes in order to pay for at least the peacetime expenditures of the Government.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. What is the other amendment the Senator has in mind? I am merely trying to see if we may get together so that we may get along with this bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the amendment I have been discussing should be rejected, then, I have another amendment which would raise the surtax from 4 percent to 5 percent. That would fall heavily on the rich, but would raise about $250,000,000 additional.

Mr. HARRISON. I may say to the Senator, in all friendliness, if we can proceed with the tax bill, I will help the Senator, if I can, to have the yeas and nays on all his amendments and ascertain what the sentiment of the Senate is with respect to them. I merely desire to expedite the consideration of the bill, and I know we cannot do it by continuing to discuss European affairs.

Mr. TYDINGS. I appreciate what the Senator says, but we have to discuss European affairs, because European affairs are bound to affect both the appropriations and the income of the Government. I appreciate what the Senator has said, because it shows a desire on the part of the chairman of the Finance Committee to try to anticipate the difficulties which are coming; and I am going to meet the Senator in that spirit by not speaking so long as I had originally intended.

I shall try to cooperate with him; but before I close the chapter on this piece of legislation, I wish to say that it is very difficult to write tax legislation in open debate on the floor of the Senate. The difficulty is that when one tries to integrate an amendment which has not been well thought out into a tax structure he is apt to disarrange it and put a bump in it and penalize and hurt some group or groups and not make the taxation general and equally distributed.

I have had these amendments prepared by the staff of the Joint Committee on Taxation, and they have told me they are so written as to integrate them into the tax bill which is now before the Senate. Therefore, I feel that, so far as one can forsee, no class would be singled out for unfair taxation by the amendments.

The pending bill provides that a single man shall have an exemption of $800 a year and that a married man with no children—that is, two people living together as man and wife but having no children—shall have an exemption of $2,000. It seems to me that the exemption for two people with no children ought to be $1,600 if an exemption of only $800 is to be allowed a single man. What would be the result? The result would be that even a married man who had an $1,800 income would pay no tax, for he would get a credit of $200 for earned income. Further than that, even then, all the single man would pay and all the married man would pay would be $10 each. I believe the average married man in this country, if he knows there has been a drastic increase in all the taxes on the rich, all the way up, missing none, together with an amendment which will still further increase those taxes, and that after all that has been taken there is not sufficient money to pay for the peacetime expenditures of the Government, excluding Army and Navy expenditures, would be glad in these emergent times to pay $10 a year to the cost of his Government. I cannot imagine that a man with no children who has an income, say, of $1,800 a year, would object to paying $10 a year taxes to his Government, if that is necessary, along with other taxes on the rich and the well-to-do of a greatly increased nature. I cannot believe that he would not want to make such a contribution to the security of his country, particularly when it is needed not so much for defense as to pay the cost of Government before we even get to defense.

So I am hoping that the chairman of the Finance Committee, who has perhaps more influence in this body than any other Senator in it, now that I have, so to speak, taken my life in my hands and come forward with a plan which cannot be popular but which I believe can be defended and which should appeal to the patriotism of our people, will not leave me out on a limb unless he can offer an amendment that is better.

I do not care who offers the amendment. If the Senator from Mississippi, or any other Senator, has any better amendments than mine, in heaven's name bring them on, but I have not heard of them, and every Senator on this floor knows that as this bill is written it will not even pay for the cost of routine expenses of the Government, not including a single dollar for national defense. Nobody will dispute that. Therefore, I have spoken in some detail, and I have offered something constructive, with no pride of authorship. If any Senator has a better proposal, let him come forward with it, and I will be glad to withdraw mine. If there is no better proposal, I hope the Senate will not adjourn before at least providing the machinery, either through a reduction of expenditures, in accordance with the Byrd amendment, or an increase of taxes, plus my amendment, to pay for the peacetime costs of the Government on the basis of the average cost during the past 10 years.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR WORK RELIEF AND RELIEF

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair) laid before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives announcing that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 544) making appropriations for work relief and relief, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, requesting a conference with the Senate thereon, and appointing conferees on the part of the House.

Mr. ADAMS. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. ADAMS, Mr. GLASS, Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. HAYDEN, Mr. BYRNES, Mr. HALE, and Mr. TOWNSEND conferees on the part of the Senate.

REVENUE BILL OF 1940

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10039) to provide for the expenses of national preparedness by raising revenue and issuing bonds, to provide a method for paying for such bonds, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 12, after line 17, to strike out:

"(4) Every trust the gross income of which for the taxable year is $100 or over; and

And in lieu thereof to insert the following:

"(4) Every trust the net income of which for the taxable year is $100 or over, or the gross income of which for the taxable year is $800 or over, regardless of the amount of the net income; and

So as to read:

(b) Fiduciary returns: Section 142 (a) of the Internal Revenue Code is amended to read as follows:

"(a) Requirement of return: Every fiduciary (except a receiver appointed by authority of law in possession of part only of the property of an individual) shall make under oath a return for any of the following individuals, estates, or trusts for which he acts, stating specifically the items of gross income thereof and the deductions and credits allowed under this chapter and such other information for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this chapter as the Commissioner with the approval of the Secretary may by regulations prescribe—

"(1) Every individual having a gross income for the taxable year of $800 or over, if single, or if married and not living with husband or wife;

"(2) Every individual having a gross income for the taxable year of $2,000 or over, if married and living with husband or wife;

"(3) Every estate the gross income of which for the taxable year is $800 or over;

"(4) Every trust the net income of which for the taxable year is $100 or over, or the gross income of which for the taxable year is $800 or over, regardless of the amount of the net income; and

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, after line 4, to strike out:

SEC. 8. Tax on cigarette papers.

Section 2000 (d) of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to tax on cigarette papers) is amended, effective July 1, 1940, by striking out "more than twenty-five but".

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 13, to change the section number from 10 to 9, and in line 15, after the word "by", to strike out "sections 5 and 8" and insert "section 5", so as to read:

SEC. 9. Taxable years to which applicable.

The amendments made by this title, except the amendments made by section 5, shall be applicable only with respect to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1939.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Title II", on page 13, line 22, after the numerals "15", to strike out "supertax" and insert "defense tax", so as to read:

SEC. 15. Defense tax for 5 years.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Bankhead	Brown	Capper
Andrews	Barkley	Bulow	Caraway
Ashurst	Bilbo	Burke	Chandler
Austin	Bone	Byrd	Clark, Idaho
Bailey	Bridges	Byrnes	Clark, Mo.

Harrison	McKellar	Schwartz	Walsh
Hatch	McNary	Schwellenbach	Wiley
Hayden	Maloney	Sheppard

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). Eighty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee on page 13, line 22.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 14, after line 12, to strike out:

"(h) Rates until January 1945: For the period after June 25, 1940, and before January 1, 1945, the rates provided in this section and section 144, of 11 percent, 15 percent, and 16 percent shall be 12⁄10 percent, 16½ percent, and 17⁶⁄10 percent, respectively. This subsection or section 15 shall not apply in any case where its application would be contrary to any treaty obligation of the United States."

And in lieu thereof to insert:

"(h) Rates until January 1945: For the period after June 25, 1940, and before January 1, 1945, the rate provided in this section and section 144, of 15 percent shall be 16½ percent. This subsection or section 15 shall not apply in any case where its operation would be contrary to any treaty obligation of the United States, nor to a resident of, or a corporation organized under the laws of, a contiguous country so long as there is in effect with such country a treaty, ratified prior to August 26, 1937, relating to rates of income tax."

So as to read:

SEC. 202. Rates of withholding.

Section 143 of the Internal Revenue Code is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(h) Rates until January 1945: For the period after June 25, 1940, and before January 1, 1945, the rate provided in this section and section 144, of 15 percent shall be 16½ percent. This subsection or section 15 shall not apply in any case where its operation would be contrary to any treaty obligation of the United States, nor to a resident of, or a corporation organized under the laws of, a contiguous country so long as there is in effect with such country a treaty, ratified prior to August 26, 1937, relating to rates of income tax."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 10, before the word "for", to strike out "super tax" and insert "defense tax", so as to read:

(b) Defense tax for 5 years: In the case of every personal holding company, the amount of surtax under this subchapter for any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1939, and before January 1, 1945, shall be 10 percent greater than the amount of surtax computed without regard to this subsection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 21, before the word "for", to strike out "super tax" and insert "defense tax", so as to read:

(b) Defense tax for 5 years: In the case of any taxpayer, the amount of tax payable under this section for any income-tax taxable year ending after June 30, 1940, and before July 1, 1945, shall be 10 percent greater than the amount of tax which would be payable if computed without regard to this subsection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, line 4, before the word "for", to strike out "super tax" and insert "defense tax", so as to read:

SEC. 205. Capital stock tax.

Section 1200 of the Internal Revenue Code is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) Defense tax for 5 years: For the year ending June 30, 1940, and for the four succeeding years ending June 30, the rates provided in subsections (a) and (b) shall be $1.10 in lieu of $1."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, line 11, before the word "for", to strike out "super tax" and insert "defense tax", and in line 12, before the word "for", to strike out "super tax" and insert "defense tax", so as to read:

SEC. 206. Estate tax.

Chapter 3 of the Internal Revenue Code is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new subchapter:

"Subchapter C—Defense tax for 5 years.

"SEC. 951. Defense tax for 5 years: In the case of a decedent dying after the date of the enactment of the Revenue Act of 1940 and before the expiration of 5 years after such date, the total amount of tax payable under this chapter shall be 10 percent greater than the amount of tax which would be payable if computed without regard to this section. For the purposes of this section, the tax computed without regard to this section shall be such tax after the application of the credits provided for in section 813 and section 936."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, line 25, before the word "for", to strike out "supertax" and insert "defense tax", so as to read:

SEC. 207. Gift tax.

Section 1001 of the Internal Revenue Code is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(d) Defense tax for 1940–45: Despite the provisions of subsection (a)"—

And so forth.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, line 8, before the word "for", to strike out "supertax" and insert "defense tax", so as to read:

(b) Defense tax for 5 years: In the case of any transfer during the period after the date of the enactment of the Revenue Act of 1940 and before July 1, 1945, the rate provided in subsection (a) shall be 27½ percent in lieu of 25 percent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, line 21, before the word "for", to strike out "supertax" and insert "defense tax"; in line 23, before the word "for", to strike out "supertax" and insert "defense tax"; in line 24, before the word "in", to insert "(a)"; on page 19, line 2, before the word "rate", to strike out "supertax" and insert "defense tax"; and, at the top of page 20, to insert:

(b) In the application of section 3441 (c) to the articles with respect to which the rate of tax is increased by this section, where the lease, contract of sale, or conditional sale, and delivery thereunder, was made before July 1, 1940, the total tax referred to in such section shall be the tax at the rate in force on June 30, 1940, and not at the increased rate.

So as to read:

CHAPTER 9A—DEFENSE TAX FOR 5 YEARS

SEC. 1650. Defense tax for 5 years.

(a) In lieu of the rates of tax specified in such of the sections of this title as are set forth in the following table, the rates applicable with respect to the period after June 30, 1940, and before July 1, 1945, shall be the rates set forth under the heading "Defense tax rate":

"(b) In the application of section 3441 (c) to the articles with respect to which the rate of tax is increased by this section, where the lease, contract of sale, or conditional sale, and delivery thereunder, was made before July 1, 1940, the total tax referred to in such section shall be the tax at the rate in force on June 30, 1940, and not at the increased rate."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, after line 8, to strike out:

Section 1700 (a) (1) of the Internal Revenue Code is amended by striking out "until July 1, 1941, is less than 41 cents" and inserting in lieu thereof "until July 1, 1940, is less than 41 cents, and after June 30, 1940, and before July 1, 1945, is less than 31 cents" and by striking out "is less than 41 cents, until July 1, 1941" and inserting in lieu thereof "is less than 41 cents until July 1, 1940, and is less than 31 cents after June 30, 1940, and before July 1, 1945".

And in lieu thereof to insert the following:

Section 1700 (a) of the Internal Revenue Code is amended to read as follows, effective July 1, 1940:

"(a) Single or Season Ticket; Subscription:

"(1) Rate: A tax on the amount paid for admission to any place, including admission by season ticket or subscription, at the following rates:

"(A) For the period after June 30, 1940, and before July 1, 1945—

"Where the amount paid is 9 cents or less, there shall be no tax;

"1 cent where the amount paid is 10 cents or more and less than 20 cents;

"1 cent for each 10 cents or fraction thereof where the amount paid is 20 cents or more;

"1 cent for each 10 cents or fraction thereof of the amount paid for admission by season ticket or subscription, if the amount which would be charged to the holder or subscriber for a single admission is 10 cents or more.

"(B) For the period after June 30, 1945—

"Where the amount paid is $3 or less, there shall be no tax;

"1 cent for each 10 cents or fraction thereof where the amount paid is more than $3;

"1 cent for each 10 cents or fraction thereof of the amount paid for admission by season ticket or subscription, if the amount which would be charged to the holder or subscriber for a single admission is more than $3.

"(2) Exceptions.—

"(A) In the case of persons (except bona fide employees, municipal officers on official business, and children under 12 years of age) admitted free or at reduced rates to any place at a time when and under circumstances under which an admission charge is made to other persons, an equivalent tax shall be collected based on the price so charged to such other persons for the same or similar accommodations, to be paid by the person so admitted.

"(B) No tax shall be imposed in the case of persons admitted free to any spoken play (not a mechanical reproduction), whether or not set to music or with musical parts or accompaniments, which is a consecutive narrative interpreted by a single set of characters, all necessary to the development of the plot, in two or more acts, the performance consuming more than 1 hour and 45 minutes of time. In the case of tickets or cards of admission to any such spoken play sold at the ticket office of theaters at reduced rates the tax shall be based upon the price for which sold.

"(3) By whom paid.—The tax imposed under paragraph (1) shall be paid by the person paying for such admission."

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, what is the pending proposal? I cannot keep up with it as the clerk is reading.

Mr. HARRISON. This is the admissions tax.

Mr. McNARY. It is section 1700; is it not?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. I should like to have some explanation of the change.

Mr. HARRISON. I may say to the Senator that the change is that the House bill sought to raise the admissions tax by a reduction of the exemption from 40 cents to 30 cents. The Committee on Finance reduced it and made the exemption 9 cents, and then raised it. On admissions up to and including 9 cents there is no tax. On admissions of more than 9 cents and less than 20 cents there is a tax of 1 cent. On admissions of 20 cents or more, the tax is 1 cent on each 10 cents or fraction thereof.

Mr. McNARY. Is the committee substituting a graduated tax for a flat tax?

Mr. HARRISON. That is correct, although in the present law there is no tax on admissions less than 41 cents. The House reduced the exemption to 30 cents, and we adjusted the rates. It is estimated that we shall receive an increase of $71,900,000 over the amount raised by the House bill, and $103,000,000 over the amount raised by existing law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee beginning on page 20, after line 8.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, after line 21, to strike out:

SEC. 212. Tobacco, snuff, cigars, and cigarettes.

Subchapter A of chapter 15 of the Internal Revenue Code is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new sections:

"SEC. 2004. Supertax for 5 years.

"Except in the case of chewing tobacco, in lieu of the rates of tax specified in such of the sections of this title as are set forth in the following table, the rates applicable with respect to the period after June 30, 1940, and before July 1, 1945, shall be the rates set forth under the heading 'Supertax rate':

"Section	Description of tax	Old rate	Super-tax rate
2000 (a) (1)	Snuff	18 cents	21 cents.
2000 (a) (2)	Tobacco	18 cents	21 cents.
2000 (b)	Snuff flour	18 cents	21 cents.
2000 (c) (1)	Cigars	75 cents	87½ cents.
2000 (c) (1)	Cigars	$2	$2.33⅓.
2000 (c) (1)	Cigars	$3	$3.50.
2000 (c) (1)	Cigars	$5	$5.83⅓.
2000 (c) (1)	Cigars	$10.50	$12.25.
2000 (c) (1)	Cigars	$13.50	$15.75.
2000 (c) (2)	Cigarettes	$3	$3.50.
2000 (c) (2)	Cigarettes	$7.20	$8.40.
2000 (d)	Cigarette paper	½ cent	7/12 cent.
2000 (d), except the last line.	Cigarette paper	1 cent	1⅙ cents.

"SEC. 2005. Floor-stocks tax:

"(a) Floor-stocks tax: Upon all the articles (except chewing tobacco) subject to tax under subsection (a), (b), or (c) of section 2000, which, on July 1, 1940, are held by any person for sale otherwise than in retail stocks, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a floor-stocks tax at a rate equal to the increase in rate of tax made applicable to such articles by section 2004.

"(b) Returns: Every person required by this section to pay any floor-stocks tax shall, on or before August 1, 1940, under such regulations as the Commissioner with the approval of the Secretary shall prescribe, make a return and pay such tax, except that in the case of articles held by manufacturers and importers the Commissioner may collect the tax with respect to all or part of such articles by means of stamp rather than return, and in such case may make an assessment against such manufacturer or importer having tobacco-tax stamps on hand July 1, 1940, for the difference between the amount paid for such stamps and the increased rates specified in section 2004.

"(c) Laws applicable: All provisions of law, including penalties, applicable in respect of the taxes imposed by section 2000 shall, insofar as applicable and not inconsistent with this section, be applicable with respect to the floor-stocks tax imposed by subsection (a)."

And in lieu thereof to insert the following:

SEC. 212. Floor-stocks tax on certain tobacco products:

Subchapter A of chapter 15 of the Internal Revenue Code is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 2004. Floor-stocks tax.

"Upon all articles (except chewing tobacco) subject to tax under subsection (a), (b), or (c) of section 2000 which on July 1, 1940, are held by any person for sale there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a floor-stocks tax at a rate equal to the increase, if any, in rate of tax made applicable to such articles by the Revenue Act of 1940."

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that is the subject to which I made reference earlier in the day, when the able Senator from Mississippi was making a preliminary statement concerning the different provisions of the bill. I should like to have a complete statement regarding the reasons which prompted the committee to eliminate the increased tax on tobacco.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement in answer to the Senator from Oregon, and then the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] may handle the matter.

There was carried in the House bill an increase in the tax on tobacco products. It was found that the tax on tobacco was being felt greatly by the tobacco farmers. Representatives of the tobacco farmers appeared before us and told us how tobacco had been affected. So we eliminated the increased taxes that the House had placed on tobacco, which would have raised a total of $79,000,000 additional, and tried to place it on other items. So the whole tobacco tax was reduced to that of the present law, including cigarettes, cigarette papers and also cigars.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Inasmuch as I represent a State which is in a very minor degree interested in tobacco, I feel free to make a statement as to the reason of the committee's action, which was that it appeared from the statement not only of the tobacco growers and those who were interested in the production of the various tobacco products but also from the statement of the Treasury officials that tobacco is the only commodity in the United States which is still bearing the full measure of the taxes which were imposed during the last war, and which have never been reduced. It seemed unfair to superimpose a new set of taxes above the taxes imposed in the last war on one commodity until other commodities and other occupations have been brought up to something equivalent to the same level, in addition to which, of course, it is recognized that the tobacco industry has suffered a terrific blow by reason of the present war and the shutting off of the exports which it formerly made.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. McNARY. Yes; I yield for an explanation.

Mr. BARKLEY. As stated by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] and also the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], tobacco—which is an agricultural product—is the only commodity in the United States which still bears the World War taxes. The only reduction that has ever been made was on a certain type of cigars; but, taking it as a whole, tobacco bears the same tax that was levied on it during the World War.

It will be astonishing to those who have not looked into the matter to realize that one-tenth of the entire revenues of the United States now come from tobacco. In 1939 the Treasury received approximately $600,000,000 from the tax already on tobacco. That is one-tenth of the entire revenue; and as late as 3 years ago the amount that tobacco contributed to the Treasury was one-eighth of the entire revenue of the United States Treasury.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, what point could be made by that statement, when we know that the tobacco consumers include practically every consumer in the country? That is no argument.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Senator from Oregon came from a tobacco-growing section he would know that there is a point to it, because while on cigarettes and other forms of tobacco the tax is paid by the purchaser of the finished product, as a matter of fact, a substantial part of it comes out of the grower himself. There has not been an increase in the tax on tobacco products, and there will not be an increase, that will not be used by the buyers of tobacco—who are limited to four or five large companies—as a reason why the price to the grower should be reduced.

Let me point out the fact that there is already a tax of 18 cents a pound on snuff tobacco. Snuff is made out of a dark, heavy tobacco. I have often said that it takes 13 months out of every 12 to produce a crop of tobacco. It is nearly all cultivated by hand. It is cut and housed and fired and processed very largely by hand. The average price received by the farmer for the type of tobacco that goes into snuff is 6 cents a pound, and yet there is a tax of 18 cents a pound on it. The pending bill as it came from the House proposed to raise the tax to 21 cents a pound, making the Government of the United States get more than three times as much out of this product as the farmer gets out of it. While the Government last year received approximately $600,000,000 in revenue from its tax on tobacco, the farmers all over the United States on the whole received about $200,000,000; so the Government of the United States is receiving practically three times as much in the way of taxes as the growers are receiving for producing this product.

There is no other agricultural product in the United States that is taxed in any such way. While we admit that tobacco is a luxury so far as those who use it are concerned, it is not a luxury so far as those who grow it are concerned. It is just as much a necessity as wheat or cotton or rice or hemp or corn so far as the grower is concerned, and it requires infinitely more labor on the part of any farmer to produce a crop of tobacco than it does to produce any other crop that I know anything about. I know something about it, because I was raised on a tobacco farm, and it was frequently said of me that I grew up between two tobacco rows; so I do know something about the burden involved.

I heard the Senator's sub rosa expression "pumpkin." Pumpkins grow only between rows of corn, not between rows of tobacco. [Laughter.]

The market for our tobacco has been largely a European market. There is a certain type of tobacco, known as dark fired, grown in Tennessee, Kentucky, and other States, but largely in Tennessee and Kentucky, 85 percent of which found its market abroad. For years 85 percent was shipped abroad, and only 15 percent was consumed in the United States.

The proportion is almost reversed in the case of burley tobacco, because it is largely used in cigarette manufacture in the United States, and to a certain extent that is true of flue-cured tobacco.

The war in Europe has destroyed our market for this dark-fired tobacco. There is none of it being shipped, and that means that without an additional tax the price of this product to the grower of tobacco—and the grower of the tobacco is the same sort of farmer, the same sort of American citizen as those engaged in any other agricultural production—without any additional tax on tobacco, the market having been practically destroyed for some of it, the price to the grower is bound to be reduced because of that situation itself. When added to that is this increase in the tax on tobacco products, such a situation is created that it may be utterly impossible for the grower to produce tobacco at a living price.

There is no need to place this additional burden onto the growers of tobacco. We have undertaken to raise more than the amount which will be lost, $76,000,000 to $79,000,000, by other forms of taxes provided for in the bill. Therefore, it seems to me unjust to the growers of tobacco, not to mention the users of tobacco, to undertake to increase the burden upon this particular agricultural product. That has not been done, and should not be done as to any commodity produced by the farmer.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. I wish to say to the Senator from Oregon that I come from a State where absolutely no tobacco is produced. Tobacco is produced in Wisconsin, to our west, and in Canada, to our east. I voted in the Committee on Finance against the proposed change in the bill. After rereading the testimony, particularly considering the fact that the tobacco growers formerly shipped 350,000,000 pounds of this so-called dark tobacco to European countries, and now ship but one-fifth of that amount, or 70,000,000 pounds, I became impressed with the fact that we should defer at least until January any further tax on tobacco. The tax upon tobacco remains heavy as it now is. We can revise this tax in January; we may have to do so; but I believe that the gentlemen from the tobacco-producing States made a pretty good case in view of the tremendous loss to their market by this diminution from 350,000,000 pounds down to 70,000,000 pounds. So I have changed my mind, and decided that we should defer the imposition of this heavier tax until January, when we can consider it again.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thank the Senator from Michigan. I am not speaking for the tobacco growers of Tennessee and Kentucky alone. Tobacco is grown, as the Senator has stated, in Wisconsin; it is likewise grown in Ohio and Indiana, in southern Illinois; it is grown in Missouri, although not much is grown there; it is grown in North and South Carolina; it is grown in Virginia; it is grown in Georgia, and the same situation, on the whole, affects the growers in all these States that affects the growers in the States mentioned by me originally, Tennessee and Kentucky, with which I am more familiar because the same type of tobacco is grown in those two States.

If there is anything else I can say to clarify the situation, I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. McNARY. No, Mr. President; that is quite sufficient. I have no quarrel with the tobacco growers. I do not want to see imposed on them any undue hardship, or see them denied a legitimate profit in their agricultural pursuits. I am not a member of the Committee on Finance, and I have no technical knowledge of the culture of tobacco. I may say that it has been grown in Oregon. I recall that my grandfather, who came to Oregon from Tennessee nearly a hundred years ago, raised a crop of tobacco very successfully in Oregon. So I am speaking from the standpoint of a State where tobacco could be produced. But when we read the House hearings and then find that in the Senate it is proposed to reduce this tax, or eliminate it, and place the tax on other articles, it seems rather unfair, for the reason that during all the years of the agricultural depression, with which I am somewhat conversant, the tobacco growers were probably the most successful, from the standpoint of financial earnings, among all the agricultural producers. When the A. A. A. bill came before us, tobacco was mentioned as one of the five basic commodities, as it is in the law today, and the growers of tobacco have received annually benefit payments which have been denied to the dairymen, to the producers of poultry, hay, grasses, fruits, and vegetables. The growers of tobacco have been treated as a special class, receiving benefit payments for the last 7 or 8 years denied most of the producers of agricultural and horticultural products.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. I am happy to yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. In that connection, I wish to recall to the Senator from Oregon that while tobacco is made a basic product in the Agricultural Adjustment Act, it is the only basic product which bears a tax. There is no tax on the products of cotton; there is no tax on the products of corn; there is no tax on the products of rice. Tobacco is the only basic product upon which there is a tax, and that tax amounts to one-tenth of the entire revenues of the Government.

Mr. McNARY. That is true, and that is considering only five of the crops which are called basic.

Statistics can be obtained from the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Commerce, and the Treasury Department which show that during the whole of the depression the manufacturers of tobacco have earned greater profits than the manufacturers of any other American product. I wait for an answer to that.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say to the Senator that that may be true, but the manufacturer does not bear this tax. He pays it originally, but it is taken, largely, out of the consumer and out of the producer.

I have known the time when the tobacco buyers, going into a warehouse, or onto a loose-leaf floor, where tobacco is auctioned off under the methods which now prevail, would say to the growers, "We could pay you more for this tobacco if it were not for the fact that we have to pay so much in the way of taxes into the Treasury of the United States." It is difficult for a grower to combat that situation. It may be an unjust way in which to treat the farmer, but there is no remedy against it of which I know. The buyers are now limited to four or five great companies, and if a buyer going into a warehouse uses this tax in his negotiations, the tax is already imposed, and any increase that would be added would be a depressant, so far as the price is concerned, no matter how much profit might be made by someone who made cigarettes. It certainly does not reflect itself in the price the farmer receives for the tobacco.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the statement is made in connection with every tax bill that the tax finally comes out of the producer. To what extent that is true I do not know, but it does not apply any more rigorously to the producers of tobacco than to the producers of wheat or of hops.

Mr. BARKLEY. What tax is imposed on the products of wheat?

Mr. McNARY. I suspect that when we impose a tax on liquor, which includes the delicious corn whisky manufactured in Kentucky, it comes out of the producers of wheat, and corn, and barley, and the tax on beer comes out of the producers of hops. Those are all American producers, and this bill increases the duty on whisky and beer and wine, so that it will affect the growers of grapes, and hops, and barley, and wheat. They will suffer just as much as the tobacco grower will suffer. If we are to place the argument on the burden being imposed on the growers, let us finish the argument, and say we must not vote an increase of the tax on wines or malt liquors, because the tax will affect the producers' price. If there is any difference between the producers of corn and wheat and hops and grapes, and the producers of tobacco, so far as depressing their price is concerned, I cannot understand what it can be.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. I am very glad to yield to my distinguished friend.

Mr. BARKLEY. When we come to the question of the increase in the tax on liquor, we may have something to say about that. Of course, there is this to be said, that when we tax liquor, while a portion of the liquor has been produced by the use of corn and wheat, we are taxing liquor; but when we impose a tax on tobacco, we are still taxing tobacco, and the relative price to the consumer and the producer, I think it can be demonstrated, has no relationship to the tax that is proposed in another section of the bill on certain types of liquor.

I wish to say, while the Senator is permitting me to interrupt him, that my colleague the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHANDLER], who is now presiding, shares my views about this matter, and made a very able statement to the Committee on Finance on this subject when he appeared before it last week. He is only restrained from making a statement similar to that which I have already made by the fact that he has been placed in the chair to preside over the deliberations of this great deliberative body.

Mr. McNARY. I should be very happy to yield to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHANDLER], the colleague of the majority leader.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield to the Senator from Texas; yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. I announce that I am about to relieve the junior Senator from Kentucky from his position as Presiding Officer, and take his place in the chair. [Laughter.]

Mr. McNARY. I confess a want of knowledge with respect to the technique of tobacco raising, or tobacco culture, or manufacture, but I know that tobacco is a great source of revenue, and I doubt very much if the proposed tax will come out of the growers. I think it will come out of the manufacturers of cigarettes, which almost everyone is smoking, and without working any hardship on the people of the country.

Mr. President, for 15 cents a package containing 20 cigarettes can be purchased. That includes a 6-cent Federal tax. If that tax were increased to 8 cents, which it should be in my opinion, it would not be reflected in the price the growers of tobacco would receive, but would be absorbed by the manufacturers, because of the very great profit they now make. While we speak so tenderly of the tobacco growers, for whom we have so much sympathy, I think the four great manufacturers of tobacco, who have almost a monopoly, should do their part in helping to finance our preparation for national defense.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. Not now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CONNALLY in the chair). The Senator from Oregon declines to yield.

Mr. McNARY. I am not a member of the Finance Committee, and I have not given the matter under consideration any great thought. I have simply the casual knowledge that anyone may have who reads or reasons. I wanted an explanation convincing to me—or if not convincing, at least satisfactory—as to why the producers of cigarettes and tobacco are exempted from the payment of their share. In my opinion it is their patriotic duty to carry their part of the burden of preparation for defense. That is all I have to say, and if the tax in question is not to be proposed, I will simply say that I have given my explanation, which I think should be considered in connection with this item.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I am very glad the distinguished Senator from Oregon has said that he would not oppose the amendment. I do not think any Senator has a more earnest or intelligent interest in our farmers than has the Senator from Oregon. I believe, however, he is under a misapprehension in respect to this matter. He said that this tax would be absorbed by the manufacturers. I do not think so, for the reason that the additional tax proposed in the House bill was 1 cent on top of 6 cents, making 7 cents on each package.

Now, as to the profits. There is not a manufacturer in America making a cent of profit on a pack of cigarettes. The average profit is about six-tenths of a cent to the larger manufacturers, and less than six-tenths of a cent to the smaller ones. So the increased tax would be reflected in a higher price to the consumer.

There is just the point. Cigarettes would be put on the market upon the Federal tax basis, at 16 cents a package. Senators must take notice that 29 different States in the Union are levying taxes on cigarettes. One State has a tax as high as 9 cents a package. Some have taxes of 2 cents, some of 3 cents a package.

I should like to have the Senator from Oregon get the point which I make earnestly, that an additional tax would in all probability reduce the sale of cigarettes.

I will state the situation, Mr. President, which is one of very great gravity. The State of North Carolina is the chief cigarette and tobacco producing State in the Union. It produces about 70 percent of so-called bright tobacco. Upon the outbreak of this most unfortunate war we lost our export trade at once, and that was no small matter. That was 250,000,000 pounds a year, which is from 50 to 60 percent of the annual production. That market is now gone. The farmers cannot sell abroad any more.

If the tax were now to be increased by 1 cent, and the sales were cut down here, there would be added a fresh domestic calamity to the foreign calamity, and it would be too much for the farmers to bear.

If there were but a few farmers in the State, we might say, "All right," but in North Carolina tobacco is produced in 70 counties and by 100,000 farmers. When we consider only their immediate families, about 450,000 persons would be affected by the proposed tax, but when we consider not only their families but their relatives, it would, in my opinion, affect 600,000 or 700,000 people of North Carolina.

There is another consideration. Tobacco is the principal product of my State. We receive about $26,000,000 for cotton. We receive about $30,000,000 for horticultural products. We receive $10,000,000 for peanuts, and for Irish and sweet potatoes together about $7,000,000 or $8,000,000. But the support of North Carolina and its farmers is its tobacco, which has heretofore been yielding them approximately $100,000,000, and sometimes as high as $130,000,000 a year. This year, however, we are not able to sell 250,000,000 pounds of our tobacco. The market for it is gone. France cannot buy it; England cannot buy it; Holland cannot buy it. Their Governments last year bought 175,000,000 pounds of tobacco. How many million pounds have gone abroad since? Only 1,000,000. So what will happen to us if this Federal tax be added to the old war tax, which, so far as I know, is the highest tax on any commodity in America? The present tax is 6 cents on the retail price. In terms of acreage, the Federal Government receives $1,000 an acre on our tobacco, and the farmer, at the best, cannot get $200 an acre.

All of that was shown to the committee, and I think the committee heard it with an open mind.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. To me the fallacy of the argument made by the able Senator from North Carolina is that he is pleading for his growers. If I am familiar with statistics at all, the tobacco grower has been one of the most fortunate of all the agricultural producers in the United States in the past two decades, because his production has been very profitable.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, that may seem to be so. The tobacco growers receive a pretty good price per acre. Appearances have deceived my distinguished friend. What acreage does the farmer have as a rule in tobacco? One thinks of great, broad fields, such as the wheatfields and the cornfields, but the average tobacco farm is only from 3 to 4 acres. How does the farmer make his crop? He makes it with his family. It is not a matter of machinery. He begins in January, and he and his wife and his children have to attend to the plants day by day until the time of harvest comes, and then they have to sit up with the tobacco while they cure it, and then they have to market it. As the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] said, it is a year-around job, requiring infinite care and infinite detail. While the price per pound may seem to be high—it is 20 cents a pound now, but it was only 14 cents a pound last year—the Government is receiving $1.13 for every pound.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Even that 14 cents was for the higher type of tobacco, and, of course, did not include the price for the lower grades of tobacco, which do not come in the cigarette class—chewing tobacco, snuff, certain types of cigars, and smoking-pipe tobacco—the average of which last year was not only not 14 cents but scarcely half of that.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to get the idea out of the mind of my friend, the Senator from Oregon, that the farmers are so well paid. The estimate of the Department of Agriculture is that it costs the farmer $80 an acre to cultivate his tobacco. That is 8 cents a pound. If he receives 12 cents, there is a difference of 4 cents; and when he is receiving 4 cents a pound the Government is receiving $1 13. I have always thought that we ought to reduce the old war tax on tobacco. It is the only World War tax now on the books. The tobacco farmers of the country have turned into the Federal Treasury, through this indirect method, $600,000,000, which comes very close to being equal to the sum which has been paid out to all the other farmers in America in benefits, rental payments, and soil-conservation payments. They have borne the burden. They have produced the raw materials. They have carried the handicap, and they are willing to carry the burden. But please do not destroy them in the hour when the effects of an unfortunate war have fallen upon them with greater force than upon any other class in all our country. I hope they will never fall upon any other class as severely as they have already fallen upon the tobacco farmers.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from North Carolina have so well stated my views that I shall not detain the Senate longer. I subscribe to what they have said with reference to this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment beginning on page 22 in line 22.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next committee amendment will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 25, line 8, before the word "for", to strike out "supertax" and insert "defense tax"; in line 13, before the word "rate", to strike out "supertax" and insert "defense-tax"; and in the heading of the fourth column in the table, to strike out "supertax" and insert "defense tax."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, at the end of the table, to insert:

"2800 (a) (5)---Rectifying------ 30 cents------ 40 cents."

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I cannot agree to the amendment which raises the tax from 30 cents to 40 cents a gallon on rectified spirits. At the present time a tax of 30 cents a gallon is paid on blended whiskies. No additional tax is paid on straight whiskies. Therefore, blended and rectified whiskies are now bearing a tax of 30 cents a gallon, which is not paid on other whiskies. It is now proposed not to raise the tax on all whisky, but to raise the tax only on blended whisky. It is proposed to raise it 10 cents a gallon. Mr. President, that is not done in the interest of increasing revenue.

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MINTON. I yield.

Mr. GUFFEY. I invite the Senator's attention to the first item in the table on page 25. The old rate on distilled spirits is raised from $2.25 to $3, on brandy from $2 to $2.75, and on imported perfumes from $2.25 to $3; and yet the Senator says that the tax on other liquors is not increased. What is that but an increase in taxes?

Mr. MINTON. What I mean to say is that the $3 tax is paid on distilled spirits generally. If we make the rate $3.10 on all whisky, that is all right; but if we merely want to make the straight whisky free of anything except the $3 tax, and make the blended whiskies pay $3.10, I say that is wrong. That is not a revenue measure. That is a measure designed and intended to take advantage of the present situation to give a special advantage, a competitive advantage, to straight whisky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MINTON. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The 30-cent tax was originally levied in order to adjust approximately the difference between the cost of putting straight whisky and rectified whisky on the market. If the 30-cent tax was justified when the base tax was $2.25, when the $2.25 is raised to $3 does not the Senator think that an increase of 10 cents a gallon is a very modest increase? The proportion is not even carried out. The Treasury experts testified that the tax ought to be 50 cents instead of 40 cents.

Mr. MINTON. I think the facts will show that it costs more to produce blended whisky, and the distillations which are put into blended whisky, than to produce straight whisky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Evidently the Senator is not familiar with the method of manufacturing the different kinds of whisky. It costs approximately 96 cents a gallon to produce straight whisky. That is due largely to storage, the coloring process, and things of that sort. Whenever we put a $3 tax on a gallon of straight whisky costing 96 cents, before it is started on the way to be sold it has cost $3.96.

The name "rectified whisky" is a misnomer. It is not rectified. Blended whisky is not rectified whisky. Blended whisky is very largely whisky made out of two straight whiskies. Rectified whisky consists of one-fourth straight whisky and three-fourths alcohol or distilled spirits.

Mr. MINTON. Let me ask the Senator if they do not all bear a tax of $3 a gallon?

Mr. BARKLEY. They all bear a tax of $3 a gallon.

Mr. MINTON. Up to that point they are equal.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; up to the point of the $3 tax, of course, they are all equal. But rectified whisky, as it is called, is composed of one-fourth straight whisky, which costs at the rate of 96 cents a gallon to produce, and three-fourths raw alcohol, which may have been made yesterday. It may never have been stored. The average cost of producing the alcohol is 16 cents a gallon. So three parts of a product costing 16 cents per gallon are mixed with one part of a product costing 96 cents per gallon to obtain a rectified whisky. Even with the $3 tax which is paid on the distilled spirits, which cost 16 cents to make, we start with a cost of $3.96 on the straight whisky. If we take three-fourths of a gallon of raw alcohol, which costs 12 cents, and one-fourth of a gallon of straight whisky, which costs 24 cents—one-fourth of 96—we have a total of $3.36, including the tax, on the rectified whisky. Then when we add the present tax of 30 cents—which was put on originally in order to try to adjust the difference in cost between the two products—we still have only $3.66 as the cost of production of the rectified product, plus the tax, as compared to $3.96 on the straight product, plus the tax. So there is a difference of 30 cents a gallon. When the Treasury officials testified before the Subcommittee on Ways and Means of the House they recommended a proportionate increase in the 30-cent tax, on the same theory on which the original 30-cent tax was imposed. The House did not include it. In the testimony before the Finance Committee the other day the Alcohol Control Division and the Internal Revenue Bureau of the Treasury recommended that if we desire to adjust the situation as between the different kinds of liquor referred to, the tax really ought to be 50 cents instead of 30, but the committee made it 40 cents, or an increase of 10 cents a gallon.

Mr. HERRING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MINTON. I yield.

Mr. HERRING. I wish to invite the attention of the Senator from Indiana to a certified public accountant's report which I filed with the Finance Committee, in which there is an analysis of the cost of various blends and various straight whiskies. The certified public accountant's report shows that the cost of blended whisky made with neutral spirits exceeds that of straight-run whisky.

Mr. MINTON. After all, accepting everything the Senator from Kentucky says as true, his argument is that the tax was put on to give a competitive advantage to straight whisky as against blended whisky. That was the purpose of putting the tax on in the first place; and now the Senator wants, not to raise revenue, but, under the guise of raising revenue, further to increase the advantage of straight whisky over blended whisky. Producers of blended whiskies are ready to meet their share of the tax. They do not want to evade any part of the burden of taxation which the Government seeks to place upon the people of the country to meet the defense program. They are anxious to meet their share of it, but they do not want a tax laid upon them, under the guise of raising revenue to defend the country, which does nothing except to give a competitive advantage to straight whisky, most of which, by the way, is manufactured in the State of my friend from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MINTON. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know what proportion is produced in Kentucky, but a considerable proportion of it is produced in my State. However, very large quantities of it are produced in other States. We also produce the type of whisky to which the Senator from Indiana refers. We have blenders. We have rectifiers. A very large plant in the city of Louisville is objecting to the increase of 10 cents a gallon in the tax. I am not particularly pleading for the producers of my State. As a matter of justice and fairness between the particular types which are produced in all the States which produce whisky, if there was justification for the 30-cent tax on rectified whisky when the base tax was $2.25, certainly a tax of 40 cents a gallon is justified when we raise the base tax to $3.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MINTON. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. A moment ago I understood the Senator from Kentucky to state that without considering the tax the cost of producing whisky is greater than the cost of producing alcohol. The truth is that spirits cost more to produce than does whisky.

Mr. MINTON. Spirits are of a higher proof.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; and the higher the proof the higher the tax. Of course, alcohol is pure proof. Now, when the tax is put on it applies on all whisky, whether it comes from alcohol or what not. I think where the Senator from Kentucky has not gotten the true picture is that he is assuming that without any tax, it costs more to produce the 96-cent whisky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is true that the cost of production depends somewhat on the proof, because the more you have to concentrate by distillation, the less alcohol you get out of a given quantity of grain, and, therefore, the proportionate cost is higher.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. But practically all the liquor that is put on the market is not liquor of 140 or 130 or 120 proof. It is around 90 proof.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the Senator missed my point. The point I was making was that the Senator said that it cost more to produce a gallon of whisky without any tax than it did a gallon of alcohol without any tax, of the same proof.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; I said it cost more.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is wrong.

Mr. BARKLEY. Take 90 proof, for instance; it costs more to produce, without tax, a gallon of straight whisky than it does a gallon of rectified whisky.

Mr. TYDINGS. Wait a moment. I did not ask the Senator that. I asked the Senator if it cost more to produce a gallon of whisky than it did to produce a gallon of alcohol of the same proof—not rectified.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. Oh, no.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; it does. It costs more because of the storage charges—4 years in storage in a barrel.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am talking about the initial cost.

Mr. BARKLEY. Straight whiskies, of course, have to carry not only the initial cost but they have to carry the cost of storage.

Mr. TYDINGS. I want to carry the Senator through the progressive stages, so as to get his starting point. Does he not concede, which is a fact, that it costs more to produce a gallon of alcohol than it does a gallon of whisky of the same proof, without any taxes?

Mr. BARKLEY. Not necessarily, but when you consider the cost of producing a gallon of whisky you can take raw alcohol as it was made yesterday, which is the type of alcohol which is put in rectified whisky. There are three different kinds of whiskies. I am not familiar with them and am not an expert on the subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. TYDINGS. Neither am I.

Mr. BARKLEY. My information is academic and was obtained as a matter of study. There is the straight whisky; there is the blended whisky; and there is the rectified whisky. A blended whisky may be made up of two straight whiskies.

Mr. TYDINGS. Or partly from rectified whisky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Rectified whisky has always been understood to be whisky that is part straight whisky and part raw alcohol. There are no storage charges on raw alcohol; it does not have to be more than a day old; but can be, immediately after the distillation process, put into the straight whisky, which then becomes a rectified product. If two whiskies upon which there has been a $3 tax are mixed, and the cost of production, including coloring and storage and all the rest, has been the same, then there is no difference and there would be no reason to put a tax on blended whisky as compared to straight whisky; but when you take the comparison in cost of producing a gallon of straight and a gallon of rectified whisky and get ready to put them on the market, the figures I have given on a 90-proof product are approximately correct.

While I am on my feet, I will say also that, because of great advertising ability on the part of producers of the rectified product, it is selling in the markets higher than the straight product.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. MINTON. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the Senator from Kentucky has started his argument on a false assumption, which I know he makes in good faith. In my own State most of the people in business are making straight whisky. So if I were talking to please most of my constituents, I probably would be arguing on the side of the Senator from Kentucky. The truth is, regardless of whether whisky is blended or is straight, it pays a $3 tax. That is one thing we can take as a fact. The second thing is that it costs more to produce spirits than it does whisky, for the reason that in the process of production spirits have to be distilled many times. Almost all spirits, or all that I have ever heard of, which are used in the blending of whisky, cost more to make than the whisky itself costs. So with the tax the same on the blended and straight whisky, being $3 a gallon in either case, the cost of making straight whisky and the cost of making spirits being higher in the case of spirits, spirits are at a disadvantage economically on that basis already.

As the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HERRING] has said, the figures of the certified public accountant show that blended whisky costs more than straight whisky. There is labor; there are other expenses besides those of distillation to which I have referred. I think the Senator from Indiana is on the right track. In other words, he wants all whisky taxed the same, as I understand him.

It is significant that the Treasury experts came before the Ways and Means Committee of the House, and the House did not put in what the Treasury specifically undertook to recommend that they put in, namely, this very provision which is now in the Senate bill. It was not put in until the bill came over to the Senate. Why did not the House put it in? Because they found, upon examination of the facts, that what the Senator from Indiana is now saying is the truth, that this is a discrimination against one kind of whisky, and in favor of another, when the purpose of the bill ought to be to tax all whiskies the same.

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator from Indiana has the floor.

Mr. MINTON. I yield.

Mr. GUFFEY. Is the Senator referring to blended whiskies or to rectified whiskies?

Mr. TYDINGS. I am referring to rectified whiskies.

Mr. GUFFEY. What tax do such whiskies bear?

Mr. TYDINGS. The tax is $3 a gallon.

Mr. GUFFEY. How much straight whisky is used in rectified whisky?

Mr. TYDINGS. It varies according to the brand.

Mr. GUFFEY. On spirits the tax is $3.

Mr. TYDINGS. The spirits in restified whisky pay $3 a gallon, the same as other whisky. There are four times the quantity of raw alcohol in it than is in the blended whisky.

Mr. GUFFEY. How much will the tax be under this bill on a gallon of straight whisky?

Mr. TYDINGS. Three dollars.

Mr. GUFFEY. How much will it be on a gallon of blended whisky?

Mr. TYDINGS. It is $3, just the same.

Mr. GUFFEY. On blended whisky. I am talking about rectified whisky. Rectified whisky has not over one-fourth straight whisky in it. I want to educate the Senator from Maryland on whiskies. [Laughter.]

Mr. TYDINGS. The same argument the Senator from Pennsylvania is now suggesting to me was suggested, I am advised, to the House Committee on Ways and Means. The House Committee on Ways and Means were tentatively inclined to adopt it, but when the people who actually make the two kinds of whiskies laid all the facts before the Committee on Ways and Means the committee put a uniform tax on all whiskies, as it should be, namely, $3 a gallon.

Now, under this bill, rectified whisky would be taxed at a higher rate than would straight whisky.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator from Maryland that the producers not only pay $3 just the same, but under the present law they are paying a 30-cent tax per gallon for rectifying.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. MINTON. So they have already a differential of 30 cents a gallon against them, and now it is proposed to put on 10 cents a gallon more.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MINTON. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Following the observation made by the Senator from Indiana, this differential is more than offset by the present 30-cent rectifying tax. In other words, as I understand, it takes about 4 years to age straight whisky, and on that basis there ought to be a 20-cent tax instead of a 30-cent tax, as exists at the present time. But, notwithstanding that, under this amendment, it is sought to add another 10-cent tax, making it 40 cents.

Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to make one further observation, I know something about the history of this legislation, and this is not the first time that this type of argument has been made in the Congress of the United States. Those who are interested in producing straight whiskies, and the distilleries that are interested in producing rectified whisky, have had to stir up an age-old argument in this Congress as to the type of tax and the amount of tax which should be paid on these whiskies.

What I object to, Mr. President, is that, while we are enacting a tax-revenue measure for defense purposes, when the Government needs sound, adequate defense, once again there is brought into the argument this age-old question as between those who produce the straight whisky and those who produce rectified whisky.

If we can put a 40-cent tax upon rectified whisky, then there is no reason why at the next session we cannot put on a 45- or 50-cent tax; and, sooner or later, those who have great distilleries in this country producing rectified whisky will reach the point where they will make straight whisky and be on the same basis with the distillers who make straight whisky.

When that happens, who will be the loser thereby? It will be the Treasury Department of the United States of America, because they are now paying on the basis of 90 cents a case, and under the new amendment they will pay on the basis of $1.20 a case; and so it goes. It will be possible finally to tax these men out of business, and drive them back——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MINTON. I yield to the Senator from Missouri to ask the Senator from Illinois a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Just a minute; the Senator from Indiana has yielded to the Senator from Illinois, and until he concludes there cannot be any double yielding.

Mr. MINTON. I yield to the Senator from Missouri to ask the Senator from Illinois a question.

Mr. LUCAS. I should like to finish this argument, if I may.

The point I am making is that ultimately it will be possible to tax the rectifiers out of business, to the point where they will go back to making straight whisky. When that is done there will be only one loser, and that will be the Treasury of the United States.

I desire again to emphasize the fact that this is no time, in the course of enacting a defense measure from the standpoint of revenue, to bring in this age-old quarrel between these two different types of distillers.

I hope the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MINTON. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In response to what the Senator from Illinois has said, I should like to say that the statement was made before the Finance Committee in the presence of all the Treasury officials—I was not present when they themselves made the statement, but the statement was made by the Senator from Kentucky that he had been informed by the Treasury Department, and the Treasury officials were all present when the statement was made—that rectified whisky could well stand a tax of 50 cents instead of 30 cents. The Senator from Kentucky did not offer that amendment. He limited it to 40 cents; but the statement was made on the authority of the Treasury Department that the rectifying tax could well be put at 50 cents.. I ask the Senator from Kentucky whether or not that is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. MINTON. I think I will admit that, and save an argument. I think that happened; but, of course, the Senator from Kentucky was very wise in doing that, because he knew that if he put the tax up to 50 cents the committee would not take it, because the committee actually voted this amendment into the bill by 11 to 10. It was very close.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, it does not make any difference about the vote; I imagine the vote would have been the same if the tax had been 50 cents. Not only did what the Senator from Missouri has stated occur, but at another time Mr. Stewart Berkshire, the Deputy Commissioner of Internal Revenue in charge of the Alcohol Tax Unit, stated to the full committee in the presence of some other members of the Treasury, and nobody disputed it, that in order to do to this increased tax of 75 cents a gallon on straight whisky what the 30-cent tax did with respect to a $2.25 tax, the product ought to bear a 50-cent tax instead of one of 30 cents.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I do not intend to delay the Senate any longer.

I do not know anything about whisky. Some persons say that all whisky is good, some just a little better than the others. To me it all tastes about the same, so I do not know. I would not know a blended whisky from a straight whisky or a rectified whisky, but I do know that what the Senator from Illinois has said is true—that there has been a fight on here in Washington between straight whisky and blended whiskies and rectified whiskies for years—and now the distillers of straight whisky have taken advantage of this opportunity, when we are passing a defense measure, to come in here and get a little defense for themselves—not only a little defense, but a little offense. That is what they are trying to do in this tax bill—to get a competitive advantage.

Mr. President, the House rejected the proposed amendment. The House would have none of it. The Senate put it in the bill by a vote of 11 to 10.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MINTON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The House did not pass on this question. Under the rule that was brought in under which this bill was considered by the House no amendment could be offered on the floor; and therefore the House itself did not have an opportunity to pass on the matter except as it voted for the bill as a whole.

Mr. MINTON. But, Mr. President, the committee certainly had a chance to do so. The Ways and Means Committee of the House wrote the bill. It started there. It had to start there. The foundation, the structure, and every bit of the bill were written in the Ways and Means Committee of the House. The Senator from Kentucky does not mean to tell the Senate that the persons who are fighting the fight of straight whisky were not over there before the Ways and Means Committee trying to get this proposition written in by the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say to the Senator that the hearings occurred before the subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee, and the subcommittee recommended this increase. It was eliminated by the full committee, before which hearings were not held.

Mr. MINTON. The hearings were held before the subcommittee, and the subcommittee reported the provision to the full committee, and the full committee would have none of it. So the House followed, under the rule, the bill recommended by the House committee. The bill came over here as the House bill, and now the Senate committee proposes to put on this amendment to give this advantage to the straight whiskies. It was put on and sent out of the committee by a vote of 11 to 10.

Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Illinois that this advantage should not be granted the straight whisky people at this particular time. They should not be allowed to take advantage of this unusual situation to give them further economic advantage in this competitive field.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the Legislature of Kentucky this year became very much concerned over the fight between the rectifiers and the distillers who make 100-proof old-fashioned Kentucky whiskies, which the Senators who preceded me claim to know so little about and manifest very little knowledge about, which leads me to believe that while I know nothing personally about them, I know about as much as some of those who ought to know more. [Laughter.] But by a vote of 2 to 1 in the Kentucky Legislature they decided that a certain course, which I propose to tell you about in a few minutes, should be pursued as to those who blend and who rectify whisky; and that term is a misnomer, because "rectify", according to the dictionary, means to make right, and that does not make it right. That does not make it any better for the consumption of the men and women of the country who drink whisky.

Generally speaking, rectifying consists of blending or mixing distilled spirits. The prime rectified product in the distilled-spirits industry is blended whisky. Blended whisky is a mixture of straight whisky, alcohol, commonly known as neutral spirits, and flavoring and coloring ingredients, on which certainly no tax is paid; and I hope Senators who vote for that kind of whisky will get it in their whisky when they drink it, because I am certain that does not make it any better, but that is what they will get. [Laughter.]

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK of Missouri in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CHANDLER. No; Mr. President. I listened to him, and I did not bother him when he was speaking, so I do not want him to bother me. [Laughter.]

There are also what are known as blends of straight whiskies, which I shall discuss a few moments later.

A few days ago a meeting of all the distillers in my State was held to consider this very important matter, just to see what ought to be done under the circumstances. What actually is proposed here is a 33⅓-percent increase in the tax on each product; on the straight whisky from $2.25 to $3; on the other from 30 to 40 cents. I will say that I will support a tax of 50 or 60 cents, because that comes closer to making matters even, and placing the two products in a fair position of competition.

Seventeen of the distilleries of my State—and many of them are small distilleries which have taken all of their capital to try to get enough money to engage in the business—voted to ask the Congress of the United States if it would do what they wanted it to do under the circumstances, to place the tax at 40 cents. Two of the distilleries were under the domination of the Seagram Co.—the Seagram Co. has plants in some of the other States—and two distilleries did not vote. Seventeen voted, and I have the request here, and the names of the distilleries that voted.

At the present time the law imposes a tax of $2.25 per proof gallon on distilled spirits. This is applicable both to the whisky and to the alcohol which goes into the blend, as well as to the straight whisky sold as such. In addition, the law at the present time imposes a tax of 30 cents per proof gallon on rectification; that is, on blended whisky. The 30-cent tax is not only a revenue producer but was enacted primarily to equalize the costs of blended whiskies and straight whiskies so that the former would not have an economic advantage in the markets over the latter.

As evidence of the economic philosophy under which the 30-cent rectifying tax was imposed—and, Mr. President, that is now the law—I call attention to the fact that blends of straight whiskies consisting of two or more whiskies each 4 years old, reduced in proof not below 90 percent, to which coloring and flavoring are not added, are not subject to the tax. I further call attention to the fact that gin made by redistillation in a rectifying house at substantially the same cost of production as gin made by distillation in a distillery is not subject to the tax. Thus, Congress did not impose the tax on these two rectified products which are of substantially the same cost as the unrectified product.

Due to present costs of production, 30-cent tax does not at the present time equalize the cost of production of a proof gallon of blended whisky and a proof gallon of straight whisky. The prime competition between blended whisky and straight whisky today is a competition between the 4-year-old straight whiskies and the blends, in which a 4-year-old whisky is used as the base.

The Kentucky straight whiskies now 4 years of age and which will become 4 years of age within the next year or two cost the average distiller, when placed in the warehouse for aging, 50 cents per proof gallon. The distiller has to pay 50 cents a gallon, I will say to the Senator from Pennsylvania, when he puts whisky in a warehouse in order to have it go through the aging process. Those of you who know more about that, and know how to drink whisky, know that unless it is aged in the wood it is not so good, it is not so mellow, and it is not what you spend your money for when you go to buy old-fashioned straight Kentucky whisky.

The cost to the distillery of carrying whisky averages about 10.8 cents per gallon per year. The average 4-year-old whisky on the market is today about 52 months old. Thus, a gallon of 4-year-old Kentucky straight whisky costs the distiller approximately 96 or 97 cents a gallon. The blends, on the average, consist of 25 percent whisky and 75 percent alcohol or neutral spirits. That means coloring, flavoring extracts, vanilla, and some other things. I do not know what is put in it; neither do you. You just have to drink it and hope it is all right. There have been times in the past few years when some persons have suddenly shriveled up from drinking some of this stuff that was not guaranteed 100 percent proof. [Laughter.]

The blends, on the average, consist of 25-percent whisky and 75-percent alcohol or neutral spirits. Thus the whisky ingredient in a gallon of blended whisky costs 24.2 cents, and the three-fourths gallon of alcohol costs to produce about 12 cents, so that the gallon of blended whisky costs approximately 36 cents. The difference in cost is therefore approximately 60 cents per gallon. With a 30-cent tax on rectification, the blended whisky has a cost of 30 cents per proof-gallon less than the straight whisky.

With the present advertising and labeling regulations, blended whisky has had created around it a halo which has so far enabled the blender to sell his whisky at an average price higher than that of the straight whiskies. Thus he not only has an advantage in cost but a bigger spread between cost and selling price, so that if his tax is not increased to a greater extent than is the tax on straight whisky, the tax structure will result in the blender taking the market away from the straight-whisky distiller.

There are now nearly 500,000,000 gallons of straight whisky stored in the internal-revenue bonded warehouses of the country, in which a tremendous capital investment has been made. Some 45 to 50 percent of this whisky is stored in Kentucky, that State being the greatest producer of Burley tobacco and the greatest producer of bourbon whisky in the United States.

Assuming that the increase in this tax on distilled spirits from $2.25 to $3 a gallon will to some extent diminish consumption, it is obvious that the withdrawals of the 500,000,000 gallons of bonded whiskies will be slowed up to the point where the distillers may have difficulty in meeting their obligations if, in addition to that normal slow-up, the blended whisky, due to the tax structure, is put in a position to take away any of the present straight-whisky market.

From the above it will be noted that the rectifying tax should be raised to 60 cents a proof-gallon in order to equalize costs between blended whisky and straight whisky. The bill originally proposed to increase that tax to only 40 cents, and even that increase has now been eliminated, and the tax has been left at 30 cents a proof-gallon. I claim it should be 60 cents; but the committee, in its wisdom, decided to place it at 40 cents, and we agreed to vote for the 40 cents and stand by the committee. The Treasury Department and the Federal Alcohol Administration in the Treasury Department recommended that, under the circumstances, it could stand 40 cents.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. CHANDLER. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the present law taxing the straight liquors $2.25 a gallon and the rectified 30 cents because of the rectification, will it not work to the economic advantage of the producers of straight whisky to raise the tax from $2.25 to $3 without in any way changing the tax on rectified whisky? In other words, if we are to raise one of them 75 cents a gallon, we certainly should give the other an economic advantage in the sale of its products to the country.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is the purpose of it, I will say, and I thank my colleague. The Senator from Illinois says we are raising defense taxes, and because we are raising defense taxes the Kentucky distillers who make straight whisky are agreeing to the increase in tax, but at the same time we increase their taxes we leave the other fellow just as he is, and it is not fair.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think it might be well to quote some prices. I am not going to give the names of the whiskies, because I am not in the advertising business, but I have here a list of 11 different brands of straight whisky and a list of 6 different brands of rectified or blended whisky, whichever it is, not straight whisky.

The price of the straight product ranges from $11.25 to $13.85 a case. That is the wholesale price to the public, from $11.25 to $13.85 a case, which means 12 quart bottles, containing 3 gallons. The price of the rectified product runs from $14.18 a case to $18. So that there is no danger of putting the rectifier out of business when, because of his great capital and his Nation-wide program of advertising, he is already getting from $1 to $3 a case more than the producer of the straight whisky. There is no basis for the argument that simply putting on a tax of 10 cents a gallon for the privilege of rectification, which is really for the privilege of reducing the standard of the product itself, would put these people out of business; and if we do not impose it, it certainly gives an economic advantage to the producers of straight whisky.

Mr. CHANDLER. There is no question about it, and I thank my colleague for that contribution to my remarks.

Mr. President, unless that 30-cent tax is materially increased to something approximating 60 cents a gallon, those with their capital invested in the tremendous stocks of straight whisky now in the country may find themselves in a very difficult financial position. This is particularly true of the smaller Kentucky distillers, many of whom will have difficulty in meeting their financial obligations if there is any material diminution in the rate of sale of their products.

I speak mainly for the small distilleries, such as those in the Kentucky River Valley, some of them in my county. The men and women who live in that neighborhood have had these distillery recipes for over a hundred or 150 years. They know how to make straight Kentucky whisky, and the capital is in these communities. They cannot compete with the great chains of distilleries which mix 25 percent of whisky and 75 percent of alcohol and flavoring and coloring extracts.

This is a plea to equalize the opportunity of the small distiller in Kentucky, when he is accepting a 75-cent increase of taxes to do business, to continue to meet his obligations of life.

I hope, indeed, that the amendment offered by the committee will be sustained, and I say in all sincerity it should be 10 or 20 cents higher, but we have agreed, under the circumstances, because the committee carefully considered the whole problem. I hope the Members of the Senate will stand by the Committee on Finance.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point the record of a vote taken by Kentucky distillers on June 12, 1940, on the question whether the rate should be 30 cents or 40 cents a gallon.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At a general meeting of Kentucky distillers held at Bardstown, Ky., June 12, 1940, at which meeting representatives from 22 distilling companies were present, a vote was taken as to whether or not the rectifying tax should be increased from 30 cents to 40 cents per gallon as originally proposed in H. R. 9966, and the balloting on the question resulted as follows:

In favor of an increase in the rectifying tax: James B. Beam Distilling Co., Cave Springs Distillery Corporation, Churchill Distilling Co., Dowling Bros. Distilling Co., Glencoe Distillery Co., Glenmore Distilleries Co., Inc., Labrot & Graham, Inc., H. McKenna, Inc., Tom Moore Distillery Co., Ripy Bros. Distillers, Schenley Distillers Products Corporation, Shawhan Distillery Co., Inc., Stitzel-Weller Distillery, K. Taylor Distilling Co., Taylor & Williams Distilleries, John A. Wathen Distillery Co., and Willet Distilling Co.

Opposed to an increase in the rectifying tax: Bardstown Distillery, Inc., Fairfield Distillery, Inc., and Joseph E. Seagram & Sons, Inc.

Not voting: Brown-Forman Distillery Co., and General Distillers Corporation of Kentucky.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I would not interrupt the continuity of the present discussion if I did not believe that it will be such a relatively short time before all these factors will have to be doubled and trebled, and therefore make the legislation we might pass today out of date, that I think I may do so without any great injustice to the issue involved. What I propose to do is to offer a seven-point program for the defense of America.

I realize that on this solemn day there are many besides myself whose hearts are heavy. With the surrender of the French Army, no one knows how soon the day will come when all resistance to the invincible military machine of Hitler will be utterly destroyed. Already the news service tells us that Mussolini and Ciano are on their way to a secret meeting with Hitler to determine the terms of surrender for the French people.

I know that there is not one in this Chamber who would not, if he could, repair the damage of that great loss to the cause of democracy, to the cause of culture, to the cause of international decency, to the cause of Christianity. But in the last 3 weeks, as I have spoken upon this floor and before a committee in behalf of a program which I thought would add strength to the preservation of our first line of defense, there have been many who have come to me and said, "We wish it were possible to accomplish those purposes, but it is already too late. The damage is beyond possible repair. All we would do, therefore, would be to make a gesture if we followed your counsel. The cause is already irrevocably lost." They have already come to the consciousness that we live in a new and a more tragic world.

Mr. President, I shall not, therefore, dwell at any appreciable length upon the significance of the present situation, because my purpose is to offer a constructive program, under seven headings, which I believe will meet the demands of the American people that every energy of this great Nation, every power we possess—physical, mental, and spiritual—shall be dedicated to the cause of the preparation of the United States against a foe they know is already marching in this direction.

Mr. President, what has concerned me principally today is a sort of theoretical query which has been in my mind: What kind of an apology have those who would defend this generation's democracy to offer to posterity for this criminal neglect in its defense? What are they going to say paralyzed the will of the democracies of the world? What mysterious germ, what magic power will they say so took in its grasp the will of the democracies of the world that it was paralyzed and stagnant in the face of danger which not only threatened but accomplished its inevitable and permanent dissolution?

What are they to say about our complacency toward Hitler? In 1933 a man comes to power in the German Nation, after he has written and published to the world a book in which he declared that the German people were destined to rule the world, and declared as a single objective the accomplishment of that end, against all odds, with an unswerving and undefeatable will, by every form of perfidy and destruction that was available to his marvelous ingenuity or his extraordinary genius. Yet the world paid no attention. With those weapons he destroyed the liberties of 80,000,000 great, brave, strong people; and still we waited. Then he went outside of his own borders, using the same methods and tactics, following the same declared course; and one nation after another—strong, virile, dynamic—came to heel, many with only the threat of his terrible sword.

Others put up such resistance as their archaic methods would allow.

He went with a new procedure behind the lines of battle. He paralyzed the minds and the will of a people to fight. So he had defeated them behind the lines before he ever had attacked them at the front.

Mr. President, this generation in the last 7 years has seen the most terrible epic that the human race has ever had the horrible experience to witness. One after another countries have fallen—nations with supposedly great statesmen, men of far-sighted wisdom, well-informed foreign offices, competent and experienced intelligence units—nations that were empires of the first magnitude, whose word rang round the earth, and upon whose flag the sun in its heaven never set.

One of those empires, Mr. President, so little understanding this new peril that had arisen upon the horizon, is now, today, a bonded slave to Adolf Hitler and his satellites in the wicked confederacy which he has created. That country, whose flower is the fleur-de-lis; that country, whose banner is the tricolor; whose motto is "Liberté, égalité, Fraternité"—France—is no more. France is a vassal. France is dead.

And England, no longer the lion of old—king of beasts—Great Britain now is a great wounded lion tottering under this great, invincible sword which threatens to take its life-blood when it falls.

Mr. President, that is the world in which today we are debating whether one kind of whisky or another kind of whisky shall pay a tax of $3 a gallon.

Already Mussolini, Ciano, Ribbentrop, and Hitler are parceling out the African colonies of France. They have probably already taken over the French Fleet, or made arrangements to take it over, for no one is senile enough to imagine that they are going to let the Army of France and the people of France be spared unless they make the unconditional sacrifice at least of their fleet intact.

Mr. President, mark my word, if they do not do it, there will not be a man alive on fair France's soil after the time in which the sword of Germany could put them to death.

The naval authorities say that if you will add the French Fleet to the Italian Fleet and the German Fleet you will have a superiority in capital ships on the side of the British as against that combination, but probably a superiority of light ships on the part of the combination of Hitler, Mussolini, and the French Fleet. But, in addition to that, what is that smoke on the horizon by the East Indies? That is the fleet of the yellow men—almost the equal of the fleet of the United States itself. When Hitler and his combination marshal their forces for an attack upon Great Britain, do you think the yellow men of the east are to stay quiet in their territory, or do you not know that they will raise their sword upon the East Indies for its rubber, it manganese, and the other minerals that are not found in such plenitude anywhere else in the world, which are there almost at their doorstep. Add that fleet to the combination of Mussolini and Hitler and the French Fleet and you have a united superiority over the whole British Fleet, even if it were all in one place.

But, Mr. President, I can go further. If you add that combination together, and even had the fleet of the United States and the fleet of Great Britain, that combination as against the combination of Great Britain and the United States of America would be as 9 to 10. Even if every unit of our power were flung into that combination, even then there would be hardly an advantage to the British side.

But, Mr. President, where do you think the British Fleet is? Is it all in home waters? Is it even all in the Mediterranean? I should say roughly that 50 percent of that fleet is scattered around the world—Canada, New Zealand, Australia, the Singapore base, and the waters of the Indian Ocean, and upon the seven seas—wherever the proud flag of Great Britain up until a little while ago was the ensign of an empire which was master of all it surveyed. Britannia did rule the waves, Mr. President, until this horrible thing took place.

So I say these units—that is, the combination of Mussolini and Hitler and the Navy of France, if they shall possess it—do not have to go to Singapore, they do not have to go to Australia, they do not have to go to New Zealand, they do not have to go to Canada. All they have to do is to tighten their stranglehold around the little isle of the United Kingdom. They do not even have to encompass all the islands off the coast of the United Kingdom.

Mr. President, with but 50 percent of the British Fleet in the home waters to defend the islands of the United Kingdom, it is a very easy matter for this combination of powers to make a combination which will be overwhelming as against that portion of the British Navy.

But, Mr. President, I go a bit further. I am told that the British have three principal naval bases from Le Havre to Norway. Who now controls the territory from Le Havre to Norway? All that thousand or more miles of coast is subject definitely to just one will, the will of Adolf Hitler, and his diving Stukas which may rain death on it from the air.

In other words Hitler controls the bases all the way from Le Havre on the south and all points on the French coast, the channel ports, the ports along the coast of Norway, the Danish coast and, of course, the German coast.

A navy cannot operate without bases. It is absolutely impotent without a base for more than a short period of time. It cannot operate without those bases to which it can come for coal, oil, or for repair. So without those three bases upon the coast, on which now Germany has unquestioned sway, there may be one base in Great Britain proper.

But I ask you what would happen if in using that one base the ships were all to congregate, a great number of their great fleet, at that particularly vulnerable point. For I am assuming in making these remarks that Germany still retains an air superiority over Great Britain and France. In the beginning of the war, when England had an air force and France had an air force, and when Italy was not in the war, even then German air superiority was unquestioned. But now with France no longer in the war, with France a vassal state, and Italy in the war, there can be no possible question but what the combined air power of Mussolini and Hitler exceeds anything which the British can possibly command.

So you give an approximate equality of naval strength to Hitler and Mussolini, and then you give them an unquestioned air superiority, and limit their field of attack to just the island of the United Kingdom. I ask, Mr. President, how long can brave Britain hold out against that vicious combination?

Therefore I give considerable credence to the estimate that has been made by certain military experts, whose names I shall not call here, who said at first that perhaps Great Britain would hold out until July. A little time ago before France fell they said perhaps the war would last until the 1st of September. But I venture to say that Great Britain will be starved out, instead of bombed out, for the very reason that they do not have a food supply sufficient to last more than a few weeks. And ships may circle the world in their effort to get food from the four corners of the earth, but when they bring it back to Great Britain, where are they going to stop? They must stop the ship, and the ship then becomes an immobile target, and the dock at which it unloads is, of course, an immobile target; so what about the airplanes up above? What did they do in the attacks on the docks at Dunkerque? They literally tore them into shambles.

So if the attacks on the docks at Dunkerque 22 miles away from the English coast could be successfully made, what is there to keep them from making shambles out of the ports of the United Kingdom when its ships come from across the seas and attempt to dock and unload the food with which to feed the people of England?

Mr. President, there were some persons a little while ago who said, "No, no, the British Ambassador is simply disseminating vicious propaganda. He is just trying to get the American people into the war, when talking about the British giving up their fleet." And then some said, "Well, what about the French giving up their fleet?" The reply was, "Oh, that is some more of that vicious propaganda emanating no doubt from the French Embassy this time and there is nothing to it."

Yet here is the newspaper of this afternoon. If I am not a man who is out of his mind, I see headlines in a Washington newspaper:

France asks for armistice—Germany demands surrender.

Then here in the next headline I see:

Britain fears Nazis will use captured fleet for invasion.

Apparently even the British are thinking there might be something to it.

Does anyone think that Hitler is a sentimentalist?

Does any Senator think that this is another Grant, who, according to the code of chivalry, takes the sword of another gallant Lee? Are we dealing with a Grant versed and steeped in the traditions of Americansm, dealing with a gallant foe who fought a gallant fight, handing back the sword to the brave owner who carried it so illustriously upon scores of battlefields This is a beast, in whose heart there is no sentiment except the sentiment to crush all opposition to his iniquitous plan.

In the summer of 1938 my wife and I had an experience which I suppose will be historical. We sat 20 feet away from Adolf Hitler, on the porch of the House of German Art in Munich, with only one table intervening between ours and his. I looked him in the eye. I looked at the cut of his face. If I ever saw the stare of a man inconsiderate of all sentiment which stood in the way of the realization of his purpose, it was in the eye of Adolf Hitler. I looked at that face, and it seemed to be cut out of stone, Mr. President. If I were delineating it in bronze or stone I should make a straight line from one cheek bone to the corner of the chin; another from the other cheek bone to the corner of the chin, a straight line across the bottom, and a straight line across the top. That would represent the fixity of purpose in the cold, hard face of Adolf Hitler.

Mr. President, that is the kind of man we are considering—worse even than Napoleon ever dared to be, more cruel than any conqueror whose hand ever held sway over the earth, and more dangerous, because he is a greater genius than any military commander the world has seen to date. The Kaiser's legions, then the flower of soldiery on the face of the earth, took 4 years and never reached Paris. This time, 5 days after Hitler really began his attack upon Paris, the French capital capitulated. Today, less than 2 weeks from the time Hitler began his march across France, there is not a straight line in the French Army, French soldiers are fighting as guerillas here and there, some of them not able to realize that the order to cease firing really means that fair France had died into slavery.

Mr. President, a moment ago I stated that the question which troubles me is, What has happened to us? What happened to Chamberlain, Baldwin, and their compatriots? What happened to the French statesmen? What happened to Gamelin? I remember that in the summer of 1938 the French placed so much confidence in the wisdom of General Gamelin that I was advised officially and authentically that he had told the British Cabinet that he could crack the Siegfried line if he were ordered to do so.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I prefer not to yield, if the Senator will excuse me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. PEPPER. The British had so much confidence in him that they believed him.

What will posterity say about the statement which Chamberlain made a little while before Adolf Hitler unleashed his tigerlike Army against the Allies? What did poor, old, deluded Chamberlain say? "Hitler has missed the bus." That was the statement of the Prime Minister of Great Britain, with two or three little mechanized divisions in Flanders, with the French depending upon the Maginot line for protection, and really no adequate preparation for modern war. Yet when Hitler was poised to strike his deadly blow, the Prime Minister of Great Britain said, "Hitler has missed the bus." I think that statement will go down in history as perhaps the most descriptive statement any statesman has uttered showing a total lack of understanding of the kind of war we face and the kind of world ours had become.

If we search Europe, we cannot find a single power which dares to raise its head against the power of Hitler and Hitler's Germany. So Europe is his vassal. France is no more than a slave. A few days ago I said that I hoped we would have a memorial service when France died. I thought of the beauty of French literature and the luster of French learning. I thought of the grandeur of the French character in the past, and how France had written in gilded letters across the illuminated sky of man's history the great accomplishments of the French people. I wish we could have paused, Mr. President, in at least a word of sympathetic sadness when the fair name of France was blotted from the map of the world. At other times she came back; but no Hitler conquered her in days past.

Such is Europe. There is nothing but vassals and slaves. Reaching to the southwest, we find a vassal state. Italy is already in collusion with Hitler. The Balkans are already trembling in their boots at every word and command he utters. Over there is a giant of Europe and Asia, Stalin, whose own bloody hand is a part of the bloody conspiracy. How far does the conspiracy reach? Take the continent of Africa, Mr. President. Does anyone think that the airplanes of Hitler and Mussolini could not pulverize any and every city upon the whole continent of Africa? So Hitler, I say, is the master of that continent also. In league with Russia and Japan, does anybody deny that he dominates the policy of Asia and of the Far East? The East Indies are just as much the property of Hitler today as my hat is my property, which I have the power to pick up when I reach my office.

So, Mr. President, there is Europe. There is Africa. There is Asia. Let us look into the far Pacific. There we see the little continent of Australia, in the shadow of the Japanese Navy, buttressed by the navy of Italy and Germany. How long could that little country stand up? So that continent, too, today shivers under the Nazi threat. New Zealand and the islands of the Pacific are all in the same category. Today the will of Adolf Hitler is the supreme human force on the face of the earth.

"But," it is said, "look at the majesty of Great Britain, whose far-flung empire reaches around the word."

Mr. President, I make a sad announcement, in which I believe every Senator concurs. I will not say where Britain ranks in the category of nations, but Senators will understand me when I say that Great Britain is no longer a first-class power. Senators will understand me when I say that the same thing applies to the United States of America.

So here we are. The world which we used to know is dead—as much so as the ruins of Pompeii, which bring back to our mind a civilization long gone. The world in which we lived 7 years ago is a collapsed and crushed world, as dead as the ancient ruins of imperial Rome. So we need not speak about the majesty of the past. We had better concern ourselves with the challenge of the present and the future.

Someone says, "Yes, but we still have the majesty of the Western Hemisphere untouched." For a simple illustration, obtain a copy of the United States News Week for the last issue and see the number of Germans, Italians, and others of like faith and attitude who are distributed among the nations of South America. A few days ago on this floor I adverted to a fact which all Senators noticed: When the President of Brazil made a speech, he paid a compliment to the democracies, but he took pains to extol the glories of the new age which is exemplified by the virility of the totalitarian states.

But, Mr. President, someone says that the Western Hemisphere is still immune. I shall not go into the technical description of the various countries to the south of us. Many persons already think that they do not come fairly in the category of democracies. Senators know what I mean when I say that. Dictatorship is a sentiment not unknown to some. Some regale themselves with the prospect of how much mightier they could become if they followed in the illustrious footsteps of some of the dictators abroad.

The Brazilian President sent a telegram of explanation of his speech. Why did it call for an explanation? It must have had ominous language in it which made the President want to disabuse the mind of our President and our people as to any hostile intent we might have suspected in his remarks. At least the speech was capable of a double interpretation.

I thank God that the illustrious President of Brazil renewed his assurances of loyalty to the President of the United States; but even without Great Britain falling, if the mailed finger of Hitler points at one of those countries and says, "Trade with me," how many of them dare refuse? What protection can we give them if they do refuse? Will we buy their wheat, corn, cotton, cattle, meat, lard, and raw materials which we produce in abundance in this country? If so, what will Senators' constituents back home say when we come to vote money to buy their products when we cannot sell even what we grow in our own soil?

The Germans say that with their trade policies they can undermine our economy and stir up dissensions among us, weaken confidence in our Government, and bring our people nearer to doubt or hostility toward their own Government and traditions.

In this morning's newspaper there was a statement credited to the propaganda minister of Germany, who said it would be an easy matter to stir up revolution even in North America. Mark my words, Mr. President. We have already lost South America. Do Senators hear that? I am a responsible man when I make that statement. The United States today has less influence in a pinch in South America than has Hitler; and I challenge future historians to deny that statement.

So, Mr. President, the isolationists have succeeded, perhaps beyond their fondest dreams. America has become isolated at last. We did not isolate it. Hitler isolated it by a policy of encirclement which today has made us shrink back toward the confines of our own continent—even, I dare to say, north almost to the Panama Canal.

Americans, are you willing to give up your standard of living and do without exports? A Senator on this floor, speaking honestly to me one day in this Chamber when I spoke on this vital subject, said, "We do not want war." I said, "Senator, do you not see the implications of the present situation?" He said, "Why, of course, I do. It means that we shall go back to a standard of living equal to that of 1835. Take the men off the W. P. A., take away the subsidy from the farmer, take away our R. F. C. aid to business, take away the Government's program to aid all of our people, because the Government will not have the money to do it, let cotton drop to 4 or 3 cents a pound, and then not find a market for more than two-thirds of what we grow at that price, let corn drop to a few cents a bushel, let wheat become an unprofitable crop, let hogs go so low in price as to be incapable of sustaining the farmer upon his farm, let our economy crumble under our very eyes, and what will the American people be saying? Will they not be speaking sentiments upon which "fifth columnists" and Trojan horses may grow?

I tell you, Mr. President, that our country today faces the greatest challenge to our security that we have ever had in any day since the dark days when George Washington alone, by almost a Divine intervention on his side and the incomparable courage of the American people, was able to wrest the independence of this country from another.

That is the reason, Mr. President—because I was disturbed—that I wanted to offer a constructive program, for which today I know I shall be criticized. It will be said that I am a warmonger; that I am engaged in a policy for the dissemination of hysteria; that I am an irresponsible second- or third-rate Member of this body; but, Mr. President, I challenge you to wait a few weeks and see if the American people do not demand the program that I am going to offer right now, for they sense, in the way that the intuitive faculties of the people sometimes understand more than they can describe, the traditions of our country that are about to be destroyed, and they sense a jeopardy which we never before experienced.

Mr. President, it is a 7-point program that I submit for the defense of America.

A few days ago Senators were saying, "We cannot send anything abroad now; we do not have it." All right. Let us talk primarily about America and its defense.

First. Confer upon the President full wartime power to prepare and defend America. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Just a moment; the Senator will suspend. Under the rules of the Senate, no demonstrations whatever are permitted in the galleries. Those rules must be obeyed.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Would it not be wise for the Chair to instruct the doorkeepers that when the guests of the Senate violate this rule they will be ejected?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The doorkeepers understand their duties, and the Chair is sure they will remove from the galleries any person who violates the rules of the Senate.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I want it distinctly understood that when I refer to the President I am not talking about a particular President; I am talking about the President of the United States of America whoever he may be. I speak in the shadow of another election which will give the people of America in the democratic way—which, thank God, still a little while longer will live here—the right to determine who their President shall be. If a Republican or some other President, by the will of the American people, is elected to the White House of our country, I still offer this program for the President of the United States of America.

So, Mr. President, I suggest:

First. Confer upon the President full wartime power to prepare and defend America.

Second. Universal defense service, so that every citizen may be best trained and placed for the country's defense.

I mean by that just what I say: Universal service, enacted as soon as the present Congress can enact it, calling to the colors of their country the men of this Nation—young men, middle-aged men, and older men—every one of them to take his place where his Government may judge that he may best serve—in the Army, in a factory, upon a highway, in building forts or ships, or whatever the defense of this God-blessed country may require.

Third. Confer upon the President power to suspend all rules, regulations, and statutes, including Army, Navy, and departmental seniority regulations, which in his judgment interfere with the maximum speed in the production, transportation, or manufacture of defense materials.

I mean by that, confer upon the President—the people's President, whoever he is, acting, of course, as he will always act, upon the advice of the proper agencies of the Government—confer upon some official who can act the power to say, if a young officer is better to lead a company than an older officer, that he shall be at the head of it. If a young naval officer is more competent on the sea than an older one, put the young officer in charge of the ship. If our country is in danger, we cannot quibble about individual rights of seniority in a crisis like that.

In addition to that, Mr. President, I have purposely included the power to suspend the wage-hour law, the power to suspend the Walsh-Healey Act, the power to suspend the National Labor Relations Act, the power to suspend any rule, any regulation, any statute which the President thinks, in his wise discretion, will interfere with the vital necessity of this country's arming itself at the earliest possible time that conditions permit.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida has declined to yield.

Mr. WALSH. The President already has power, in the interest of the national defense, to suspend every labor law.

Mr. PEPPER. I thank the Senator. I am delighted to have the able Senator confirm that.

If more hours of work are required of labor, I favor conferring upon the President power to require whatever number of hours the national emergency may necessitate; for though I have tried to defend labor as loyally as I knew how, I say to the labor unions, whose interests I have always supported on this floor, "The only chance you have to have collective bargaining and liberty of economic action is for your country to live and democracy to exist upon the face of the earth." I say to the workingman, "The only chance you have to keep from being a slave, ordered like a scourged slave from one place to another, is for the majesty of the Stars and Stripes not to be questioned in all of this broad land or continent." So I make no apology to any group whose interests I may seem unjustly to affect, because I am talking about the integrity of America, and in a matter like this there is but one right, and that is the right of society to preserve itself against all enemies.

Fourth. Confer upon the President power to suspend the present debt limitation if in his judgment such limitation interferes with the maximum speed of the defense program.

It is not any longer a question of debt limitation or of money. It is a question of building ships, of building airplanes, of building arms, of acquiring materials, of manufacturing powder, of constructing tanks, or making armored cars; and money means no more than a buried treasure if it is not the instrument by which the independence of our country may be preserved.

While we made a gallant gesture toward increasing the debt limit $3,000,000,000, we have already spent five billion since we started this program about 3 weeks ago, and we know that five billion is just a drop in the bucket. Let us tell the people so, and forget about the debt limit, and think in terms of 50,000 airplanes, two navies in two oceans, the master of both, and tanks necessary to be the accompaniment of a motorized army of 2,000,000 or 3,000,000 men. Let us think in the terms in which Hitler thinks, of materials of war and instruments of destruction upon the field of battle.

Fifth. Grant the President the authority to aid in material or credit those countries and nations which in his judgment at this time constitute America's first line of defense.

Remember, I said materials and credit. If England can hold out until the 1st of January, we will be prepared that much more. A little while ago I asked: Why did we not start 2 years ago? Why did we wait until it may be too late?

Two years ago all the democracies of Europe alone, if they had put their fingers upon the throat of Hitler, could have strangled him to death. Today all of them stand helpless before his might. Yet each one waited, thinking perhaps some other country would be eaten up but that it would not; being too timid to enter into a confederacy, thinking someone would charge it with violating international law or being unneutral; putting up some of the defenses which were as ancient as the Dark Ages. Their safety was already eaten out in its vitals by the traitorous "fifth columns" which had already unlocked the doors of their fortresses, and spiked their guns, and had almost made ready to sabotage their ships, and certainly had paralyzed their will to defend themselves.

How many times shall we ask ourselves "Why did we not do something a little while ago?" But we can still help with material and credit.

We hear of the Johnson Act. That has been the buttress and fortress behind which gentlemen have claimed the right to national and international distinction, and all it has been has been a cloud over the eyes of the American people, which has jeopardized the country our forefathers bought with their blood.

I am telling my colleagues, posterity will want to know why we let a few blind men lead us over the precipice which destroyed our right to live our kind of life, our standard of living, and, God forbid, perhaps the integrity of our country.

Mr. President, if a few dollars will enable the democracies to hold out until September 1 or October 1, let us get them over there as soon as we can.

Sixth. The President and the Congress to begin immediately the preparation and the adoption of a defense budget and a tax program adequate for the national defense.

We all know this tax bill is just a gesture. There is not one of us who does not know it is no more than a gesture. During the debate I felt like saying to those who were talking about whether the tax should be on straight whisky or blended whisky or rectified whisky, that they need not quibble about it, because before the tax really goes into effect it will be doubled and trebled so many times they will have forgotten about this day back in June when they distinguished between one kind and another.

We have not even begun to tighten our belts, I am telling my colleagues. I think the patriotism of the American people, as this crisis has become more acute, has been one of the finest things I have ever seen. It was not the Congress or the President; to be frank, it was the American people who demanded that we impose these taxes. They want to pay. They will pay until it hurts, because, in the way men understand when their security is in jeopardy, they know that to pay now is the only way they have of avoiding—if I may use a common expression—paying through the nose later.

I suppose the French people would be willing to appropriate a little more for defense, would they not, if they could go back a few sessions of their chamber. If they had known a few years ago, when the Chamber of Deputies met and quibbled over little things while a mighty Germany grew around but a single invincible will, what they know now, would it have taken them all the afternoon to pass a tax bill? They would have been on their knees praying that every possible resource and power be concentrated at the place where it would do the greatest good.

We might just as well not pass the tax bill unless we want to amend the title and call it tax bill No. 1. Do not call it "A," because there are not enough letters in the alphabet to describe the number we are going to have. Call it No. 1, because perhaps we can count up high enough to identify the various tax bills which will have to be passed to defend America against a dominant Hitler.

The very able and foresighted chairman of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs intimated very clearly on this floor a few days ago that if we built two navies the cost would be a colossal sum of money. Yet is there anyone who denies that we need two navies? I understand that already a bill has been introduced to increase our Navy 20 percent. Thank God for that. It does not make any difference whether we say 20 percent or 30 percent, we are building it as fast as we can. But let us build some more shipyards, let us double and treble our facilities, let us take the unemployed from the streets and highways, or from the humble homes in which they hold their sad faces in their tear-wet hands because they have not a chance to work under a democracy. Let us bring them to the shipyards and pat them on the back and say, "Thank God we have your muscles and your great strength and your strong will to work. You are Americans. Build ships. You are now building a ship, you are saving America. Build, build, build, as if your lives depended on it."

We will find "the old W. P. A. people," whom some have scorned, like Americans of all ages coming to their country's defense, and rendering meritorious service.

The last point is: Seventh. Confer on the President the power to take into custody for the duration of the defense effort all aliens whose freedom would in his opinion jeopardize the defense program.

There is no doubt in the people's minds about that subject. They do not want aliens who come to enjoy our hospitality sticking a knife in our backs. They do not want them spying upon our defenses. They do not want them disseminating vicious and destructive propaganda. Give the President the right to exercise the power of organized government, the right to put them into concentration camps, where they can do no harm through strands of barbed wire builded half to high heaven above their iniquitous heads.

I say that the American people demand of the American Congress a policy of action. Another day has passed, and we have done nothing substantial. France has fallen. Great Britain is almost to her knees. By now perhaps the French Navy is a part of the forces of Adolf Hitler and Mussolini. When in the name of God are we going to start? When are we to mobilize the will of our people, every factor of our economy, every dollar of our money, every unit of our manpower, and make this mighty Nation move as one man toward our frontiers, upon lines of defense, behind the lines, wherever they will prove to be most effective?

Mr. President, I do not suppose this is going to get a very favorable recommendation. I suppose Senators will say, "Oh, some more hysteria," or some other Senators are going to say, "I wish they would quit making these speeches. They stir up the people."

We are not stirring up the people. The people are trying to stir us up. Just listen to them and hear what they say. Hear their words. I could take State after State. Let us take the good old State of Georgia, down my way. The Macon Telegraph, the Atlanta Journal, the Atlanta Constitution, are three papers whose editorials in behalf of what I have been urging have in the last few days come to my attention. They present at least a fair cross-section of the sentiments of the fair State of Georgia.

Then we come to Alabama. We find the editor of the Montgomery Advertiser, one of the greatest papers in this country, crying out that we do something in this crucial hour. I could name a paper or papers in almost every State of the Union.

A few nights ago I spoke in Chicago, and, although it rained up until the time the speech was about to be made, there were 30,000 people present. The Chicago Tribune had said, "We warn PEPPER," in so many words, "We warn PEPPER against coming out here with his warmongering." One would have thought that they were going to set upon me like a mob. The authorities sent a couple of police officers out there. What happened? I stood before that audience and said every word I have ever said on this floor. I spoke of every iniquity and perfidy by Hitler my tongue was able to speak of, and what happened? Two in the audience booed, and, bless their holy name, some American Legion boys threw them nearly over the monument.

I say, Mr. President, that that is typical of the sentiment of America. We, as the spokesmen of a democracy, it seems to me, should wake up and lay out a program. I offer one which has come out of the heart of one who wants to be honest about this matter, though he may be deceived.

I hope to God every fear here entertained is a misconceived fear. I hope not one danger that I have foreseen shall ever come to pass. I hope that not one iota of the jeopardy that I have felt of the nightmare over my consciousness will ever come about.

Mr. President, but if I am not wrong, and if you in your hearts are not wrong, tonight is not too early to speak. I am thinking of the clock and not the calendar.

This is no time for sentiment. This is no time for ritualism. This is the time for action, because the genius of America has always called for courage, and for action, and for positive character. Thus our forefathers won this continent and all that we love today. It will be because we turn our backs to the principles which actuated them that we shall lose the inheritance our forefathers so desperately fought for.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, April 12, 1939, the President approved the Public Salary Taxing Act, in which we thought we had exempted from retroactive taxation many State employees paid either in whole or in part from Federal funds. The plain justice of exempting those employees from retroactive taxation so far appealed to us that we made every effort reasonably to comprehend within their number those who were engaged in the administration of the Social Security Act. However, on November 3, 1939, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue ruled for the first time that such employees would be required to pay Federal income taxes for the years 1936, 1937, and 1938, plus interest and a 25 percent penalty. The collector of internal revenue for the district of Connecticut has been issuing letters making demands upon the employees administering the Social Security Act in the State of Connecticut, and in the number of at least 250, so far, demands have been made for retroactive inclusion in the tax returns for this year.

It seems to me that we should, in justice to such employees, take account of their situation, and in that thought I send to the desk an amendment to the pending bill, H. R. 10039, which in due course I will offer, but for the time being I ask that it lie on the table, and that it be ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be received, lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I should like to interrogate the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. I have information that there is no longer any objection to the Senate taking up and passing the joint resolution relating to the Monroe Doctrine. It seems to me perfectly apparent that the Senator from Mississippi will not even be able to conclude the debate on the pending amendment today, and if he will yield to me I shall suggest that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, and shall ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution to which I referred.

Mr. McNARY. I will say, Mr. President, that I have further canvassed the situation, and I find no present objection to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution referred to by the Senator from Texas. I favor it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I thought we might vote on the pending amendment, and then perhaps take up the matter to which the Senator from Texas refers.

Mr. HARRISON. I wonder if we can have a vote on the pending amendment now? Will Senators be satisfied to have a division on the amendment, or is it their wish that action be taken by a yea-and-nay vote?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the vote is taken on the pending amendment I wish to say that in the committee, after listening with a great deal of care to a matter with which I was not very familiar, I reached the conclusion that the position which has been taken today by the able Senator from Indiana was the correct position, and I shall vote as he has suggested.

Mr. HARRISON. Let us have a division on the question.

Mr. CONNALLY. I understand that the minority prefers that action be taken on the joint resolution first before we act on the pending Senate amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Let us, if we can, get a vote on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment has been stated. Those in favor of the amendment will say "Aye." Opposed "No."

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask for a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A division has been called for.

Mr. MINTON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW], the Senators from Virginia [Mr. BYRD and Mr. GLASS], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], the Senator from New York [Mr. MEAD], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are necessarily detailed from the Senate.

Mr. HILL. I have a general pair with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. REED]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ]. I am not advised how either Senator would vote if present. I vote "yea."

Mr. AUSTIN. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], who would vote "nay" on this question, is paired with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CLARK], who, I am advised, would vote "yea."

My colleague the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] would vote "nay." He has a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY]. I am not advised how the Senator from West Virginia would vote.

I announce the following pairs on this question:

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW];

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD];

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. THOMAS] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE]; and

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS].

The result was announced—yeas 47, nays 25, as follows:

YEAS—47

Adams	Burke	Donahey	Hatch
Andrews	Byrnes	Downey	Hayden
Ashurst	Capper	Ellender	Hill
Bailey	Caraway	George	Holt

NOT VOTING—24

Barbour	Frazier	Mead	Thomas, Idaho
Bilbo	Gibson	Neely	Tobey
Bulow	Gillette	Reed	Vandenberg
Byrd	Glass	Reynolds	Van Nuys
Chavez	Johnson, Calif.	Shipstead	Wheeler
Clark, Idaho	McCarran	Taft	White

So the committee amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Calloway, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 4027. An act to transfer the active list of the Construction Corps to the line of the Navy, and for other purposes;

H. R. 3840. An act to amend the act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, as amended, and for other purposes;

H. R. 7074. An act to amend an act to authorize the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to make certain disposition of condemned ordnance, guns, projectiles, and other condemned material in their respective Departments;

H. R. 8745. An act making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 8913. An act making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes.

MAINTENANCE OF THE MONROE DOCTRINE

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, earlier in the day it was suggested that unanimous consent be given temporarily to lay aside the unfinished business and proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 271. At that time it was suggested by the minority leader that he was compelled to object to the request.

I have also discussed this matter with the chairman of the Finance Committee, and he has no objection, provided the matter does not result in protracted debate.

Mr. President, this is considered to be an emergency matter, by reason of the very rapidly changing conditions in Europe. The joint resolution was debated this morning by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], by myself, and by other Senators. I think we are all familiar with it. It seeks nothing but reaffirmation by the Congress of the United States of the Monroe Doctrine as affecting certain islands and lands in the Western Hemisphere. I ask unanimous consent that the pending business be temporarily laid aside and that the joint resolution be considered and acted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nevada that the pending business be temporarily laid aside and that Senate Joint Resolution 271 be considered?

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, in the absence of the able Senator from Nevada, I stated that after a further canvass I found that there was no objection, and I thereupon withdrew my objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, before action is taken on the request, let me say that if the administration had followed the resolutions introduced by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] and myself in regard to the purchase of island possessions and bases along the Atlantic coast, and other naval and air bases which we suggested months ago, even years ago, we would not be in the situation in which we find ourselves now.

If this Senate had negotiated, several years ago, for the Caribbean Islands in part payment of the old World War debts, we would not hear the press bewailing our inadequate defenses today. There would be no question about the interpretation of the Monroe Doctrine. Further, there would be no danger of European nations bringing their constant wars to our coasts. Europe and her troubles would be removed from American waters.

AID AMERICA—WHY AID EUROPE?

With these islands in our possession our coast lines would be invulnerable to any combination of powers and their navies. There were those who did not have the foresight to think in terms of America and American defense. They chattered about aiding the Allies and Europe. Now that European events have changed so rapidly perhaps we shall gain hindsight enough to act in the interests of America. We might be forced to think of aiding our own country. It has been the custom of many of our leading citizens to think only in terms of Britain and France.

AMERICA AND EUROPEAN POWER POLITICS

These are American islands geographically. They must become American islands in possession of American republics.

On the floor of the Senate, April 25, 1939, and on many other occasions I have spoken on the matter of negotiating for the Caribbean islands in part payment of the old World War debts. I called to the attention of the Senate the vast resources and possible development of these islands in addition to their strategic value to us. On that same day I included in the RECORD detailed statistics on the trade and production facilities of all the Caribbean islands, irrespective of ownership.

MONROE DOCTRINE AND WEST INDIES

I said to the Senate at that time:

I am a sincere believer in the protection of the Monroe Doctrine. In order to protect the Monroe Doctrine we must protect the Panama Canal. It is the Achilles heel, the vital spot of our defenses. We cannot fully defend it without the West Indies. The West Indies now are in the hands of foreign powers with which we have had war in the past and with which we may have war in the future. There may be difficulties to be overcome, but they are not insurmountable. While the possibility is remote, these islands may be acquired by other powers—powers other than those which now own them. Let us negotiate for them now and acquire them in this most important and vital hour.

Mr. President, I made that statement more than 1 year ago, April 25, 1939.

I repeat that statement today, and ask that this Senate have foresight enough to act now before it is too late.

I ask unanimous consent that at this point in my remarks the resolutions to which I have referred be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PURCHASE OF DUTCH WEST INDIES AND GUIANA

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 120) providing for negotiations by the President with a view to the acquisition by purchase of the colony of Curaçao and Netherlands Guiana

Whereas adequate provision for the protection of the Panama Canal is an indispensable feature of our national-defense policy; and

Whereas possession of the colony of Curaçao and Netherlands Guiana by the United States would enable it to provide more adequately for such protection; and

Whereas the colony of Curaçao and Netherlands Guiana export products in which the United States is deficient and import products of which a surplus is produced in the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President is authorized and requested to enter into negotiations, in such manner as he may deem appropriate, with the Government of Her Majesty, the Queen of the Netherlands, for the acquisition by the United States of the colony of Curaçao and Netherlands Guiana. Such negotiations shall be conducted with a view to the making of a treaty between the Government of the United States and the Government of Her Majesty, the Queen of the Netherlands, providing for the purchase by the United States of the colony of Curaçao and Netherlands Guiana.

PURCHASE OF BRITISH AND FRENCH WEST INDIES—REYNOLDS RESOLUTIONS

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 221) for the acquisition of British islands in the Caribbean and British Honduras

Resolved, etc., That the President is hereby requested to enter into negotiations in such manner as he may deem appropriate, with the Government of Great Britain for the acquisition by the United States of the islands of the Bermudas; the Bahamas—Jamaica with the Turks, Caicos, and Cayman Islands; Trinidad and Tobago; Barbados; the Leeward Islands—A'ntigua, St. Kitts, Nevis, Dominica, Montserrat, and Virgin Islands; the Windward Islands—Grenada, the Grenadines, St. Lucia, St. Vincent; together with British Honduras, in part payment for the indebtedness of such Government to the United States.

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 247) for the acquisition of French islands in the Caribbean and the North Atlantic Ocean

Resolved, etc., That the President is hereby required to enter into negotiations in such manner as he may deem appropriate with the Republic of France for the acquisition by the United States of the islands of Martinique, Guadeloupe, St. Pierre, and Miquelon, in part payment for the indebtedness of such government to the United States.

PURCHASE OF GREENLAND—LUNDEEN RESOLUTION

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 119) providing for negotiations by the President with a view to the acquisition, by purchase, of Greenland

Whereas the United States would be able to make more adequate provision for its national defense if it were in possession of Greenland; and

Whereas possession of Greenland by a power hostile to the United States would constitute a distinct threat to the United States, and particularly to the populous area along the northeast seaboard of the United States; and

Whereas valuable trade could be developed between the United States and Greenland if it were a possession of the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is authorized and requested to enter into negotiations, in such manner as he may deem appropriate, with the Government of His Majesty the King of Denmark and Iceland, for the acquisition by the United States of Greenland. Such negotiations shall be conducted with a view to the making of a treaty between the Government of the United States and the Government of His Majesty the King of Denmark and Iceland, providing for the purchase by the United States of Greenland.

LUNDEEN RESOLUTIONS—ISLAND PURCHASES FROM LATIN AMERICA

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 170) to provide for negotiations by the President with a view to acquiring certain islands owned by the Republic of Mexico

Whereas Guadalupe Island, Cerros (Cedros) Island, Isabel Island, Las Tres Marias Islands, and the Revilla Gigedo Islands are of strategic importance and vital for the defense of the Panama Canal; and

Whereas such islands are owned by the Republic of Mexico: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President is authorized and requested to enter into negotiations, in such manner as he may deem appropriate, with the Republic of Mexico with a view to acquiring by purchase or otherwise Guadalupe Island, Cerros (Cedros) Island, Isabel Island, Las Tres Marias Islands, and the Revilla Gigedo Islands from the Republic of Mexico.

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 171) to provide for negotiations by the President with a view to acquiring certain islands owned by the Republic of Ecuador

Whereas Amortajada or Santa Clara Island, La Plata Island, Puna, Salango, and the Galapagos Islands are of strategic importance and vital for the defense of the Panama Canal; and

Whereas such islands are owned by the Republic of Ecuador: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President is authorized and requested to enter into negotiations, in such manner as he may deem appropriate, with the Republic of Ecuador with a view to acquiring by purchase Amortajada or Santa Clara Island, La Plata Island, Puna, Salango, and the Galapagos Islands from the Republic of Ecuador.

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 172) to provide for negotiations by the President with a view to acquiring Malpelo Island and Gorgona from the Republic of Colombia

Whereas Malpelo Island and Gorgona are of strategic importance and vital for the defense of the Panama Canal; and

Whereas such islands are owned by the Republic of Colombia: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President is authorized and requested to enter into negotiations, in such manner as he may deem appropriate, with the Republic of Colombia with a view to acquiring by purchase Malpelo Island and Gorgona from the Republic of Colombia.

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 173) to provide for negotiations by the President with a view to acquiring certain islands owned by the Republic of Panama

Whereas Isla Coiba, Jicaron, and the Perlas Islands are of strategic importance and vital for the defense of the Panama Canal; and

Whereas such islands are owned by the Republic of Panama: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President is authorized and requested to enter into negotiations, in such manner as he may deem appropriate, with the Republic of Panama, with a view to acquiring by purchase Isla Coiba, Jicaron, and the Perlas Islands from the Republic of Panama.

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 174) to provide for negotiations by the President with a view to acquiring Cocos Island, Cano Island, and Isla San Lucas (Golfo de Nicoya) from the Republic of Costa Rica

Whereas Cocos Island, Cano Island, and Isla San Lucas (Golfo de Nicoya) are of strategic importance and vital for the defense of the Panama Canal; and

Whereas such islands are owned by the Republic of Costa Rica: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President is authorized and requested to enter into negotiations, in such manner as he may deem appropriate, with the Republic of Costa Rica with a view to acquiring by purchase Cocos Island, Cano Island, and Isla San Lucas (Golfo de Nicoya) from the Republic of Costa Rica.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nevada?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 271) approving nonrecognition of the transfer of any geographic region in the Western Hemisphere from one non-American power to another non-American power, and providing for consultation with other American republics in the event that such transfer should appear likely.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I desire to detain the Senate for only a moment. I am very much in favor of the joint resolution. I voted for it in the committee, and I am very happy indeed to have the opportunity of voting for it in the Senate. I merely desire to call attention to the fact that, so far as I know, this is the first legislative recognition of the principle of the Monroe Doctrine enunciated by President Monroe.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I may be mistaken, but I think the Senator will find that the Congress of the United States acted upon this principle in 1811, 12 years before the Monroe Doctrine was announced.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I was speaking of the doctrine enunciated in the message of President Monroe, from which I propose to quote.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. The point I should like to make is that 12 years before the Monroe Doctrine was announced Congress had already laid down the principle in an act, and that therefore it is more than proper for Congress to act at this time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I thank the Senator from Utah for his interruption. Except for the fact that this is more or less of an emergency matter, I should like to have the opportunity to discuss some of the history of the Monroe Doctrine, including the letters of Secretary of State John Quincy Adams to various European powers which preceded its enunciation.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. In addition to the interruption of the Senator from Utah, it was pointed out in the debate earlier in the day that in 1912 the Senate passed a resolution in regard to the rumored acquisition by Japan of territories in Lower California, in Magdalena Bay.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I thank the Senator for his contribution.

Of course, it has been the policy of the United States to carry out the doctrine enunciated in the joint resolution. Back in 1830, when it was proposed that Spain transfer Cuba to England, the Government of the United States very plainly indicated that it would not tolerate any such transfer. In speaking of this as its first legislative enactment I referred to the fact that it was the first time since the pronouncement of President Monroe that Congress has legislatively adopted it in a comprehensive way. Nevertheless, that majestic pronouncement has long been the cornerstone of our foreign policy. No doctrine has ever been so dear to the hearts of our people.

Mr. President, my point in rising was to quote very briefly from the message of President Monroe. It seems almost like sacrilege, in view of the great historical and oratorical effort of the distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] which has just been concluded, even to refer to so humble a patriot as James Monroe. I desire, nevertheless, to call attention to the fact that the statement of President Monroe was more than a one-way declaration. It involved certain two-way principles.

Mr. President, I desire to detain the Senate for only a moment. I quote from the message of President Monroe:

Of events in that quarter of the globe—

He was referring to Europe—

with which we have so much intercourse and from which we derive our origin, we have always been anxious and interested spectators. The citizens of the United States cherish sentiments the most friendly in favor of the liberty and happiness of their fellow men on that side of the Atlantic. In the wars of the European powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparation for our defense.

With the movements in this hemisphere we are, of necessity, more immediately connected, and by causes which must be obvious to all enlightened and impartial observers. The political system of the allied powers—

He was referring then, of course, to the Holy Alliance—is essentially different in this respect from that of America. This difference proceeds from that which exists in their respective governments; and to the defense of our own, which has been achieved by the loss of so much blood and treasure, and matured by the wisdom of their most enlightened citizens, and under which we have enjoyed unexampled felicity, this whole Nation is devoted. We owe it, therefore, to candor—

And it seems to me this sentence embraces the principle of the joint resolution now before the Senate—

We owe it, therefore, to candor—

Said President Monroe—

and to the amicable relation existing between the United States and those powers, to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere. But with the governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States. In the war between these new governments and Spain we declared our neutrality at the time of their recognition, and to this we have adhered and shall continue to adhere, provided no change shall occur which, in the judgment of the competent authorities of this Government, shall make a corresponding change on the part of the United States indispensable to their security.

Mr. President, even at the risk of subjecting President Monroe, and Secretary of State John Quincy Adams, and Secretary of War John C. Calhoun, and the other members of the Cabinet, as well as ex-Presidents Thomas Jefferson and James Madison—who were the advisers of President Monroe in writing that majestic document—to the charge of having been "isolationists," in these days a most nefarious crime, I ask unanimous consent at this point in my remarks to include the pertinent paragraphs from President Monroe's message making up the Monroe Doctrine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The late events in Spain and Portugal show that Europe is still unsettled. Of this important fact no stronger proof can be adduced than that the allied powers should have thought it proper, on any principle satisfactory to themselves, to have interposed by force in the internal concerns of Spain. To what extent such interposition may be carried, on the same principle, is a question in which all independent powers whose governments differ from theirs are interested, even those more remote, and surely none more so than the United States. Our policy in regard to Europe, which was adopted at an early stage of the wars which have so long agitated that quarter of the globe, nevertheless remains the same, which is, not to interfere in the internal concerns of any of its powers; to consider the government de facto as the legitimate government for us; to cultivate friendly relations with it, and to preserve those relations by a frank, firm, and manly policy, meeting, in all instances, the just claims of every power, submitting to injuries from none. But in regard to those continents, circumstances are eminently and conspicuously different. It is impossible that the allied powers should extend their political system to any portion of either continent without endangering our peace and happiness; nor can anyone believe that our southern brethren, if left to themselves, would adopt it of their own accord. It is equally impossible, therefore, that we should behold such interposition, in any form, with indifference. If we look to the comparative strength and resources of Spain and those new Governments, and their distance from each other, it must be obvious that she can never subdue them. It is still the true policy of the United States to leave the parties to themselves, in the hope that other powers will pursue the same course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution having been read three times, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. PITTMAN and other Senators called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WAGNER (when Mr. MEAD's name was called). My colleague [Mr. MEAD] is absent on official business. I am authorized to say that if present he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. McKELLAR. The senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] is unavoidably detained on important business. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I have a general pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. I am informed that if present he would vote as I shall vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HERRING. My colleague [Mr. GILLETTE] is detained from the Senate. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. HILL (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. REED]. I am advised that if he were present he would vote "yea," so I shall allow my vote to stand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the Chair announces that his colleague [Mr. CHAVEZ] is unavoidably detained. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. McNARY. The senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is necessarily absent. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW], the Senators from Virginia [Mr. BYRD and Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are necessarily detained from the Senate. I am advised that if present and voting these Senators would vote "yea."

Mr. AUSTIN. The following Senators are necessarily absent:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. THOMAS], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], and the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE]. I am advised that all of these Senators, if present, would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 76, nays none, as follows:

So the joint resolution was passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, in one of the newspapers I read a statement concerning Senate Joint Resolution 271 which left the impression that the reason for its enactment was that the Monroe Doctrine had been just doctrine, stated from time to time by spokesmen for our Government—doctrine, but not law.

Now, however, is not the first time that Congress has by its own action made a stand for the terms and principles of what was later called the Monroe Doctrine.

In 1811, 12 years before President Monroe himself made his famous pronouncement, the Congress of the United States passed a resolution, the words of which are as follows:

Taking into view the peculiar situation of Spain, and of the American provinces; and considering the influence which the destiny of the territory adjoining the southern border of the United States may have upon their security, tranquility, and commerce: Therefore, resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress assembled, that the United States, under the peculiar circumstances of the existing crisis, cannot, without serious inquietude, see any part of the said territory pass into the hands of any foreign power; and that a due regard to their own safety compels them to provide under certain contingencies for the temporary occupation of the said territory; they, at the same time, declare that the said territory shall, in their hands, remain subject to future negotiation.

The Monroe Doctrine is, of course, older than the 1820's. In fact, while it as a doctrine was not universally considered international law, it became that through the positive action of President Wilson in having it incorporated into the Treaty of Versailles as a regional understanding, and was definitely claimed to be international law by President Cleveland in 1895. Later in the acceptance of the conventions of 1936 and 1938 its meaning became incorporated into and made part of the understanding behind those conventions. Thus, the Monroe Doctrine is good international law of long standing and as such has been recognized for many decades.

Cleveland in presenting his position for the Monroe Doctrine says:

Practically, the principle for which we contend has peculiar, if not exclusive, relation to the United States.

Until 1936, whether the doctrine was considered as a matter of American defense, purely unilateral in its nature, whether a regional understanding or international law, it has remained almost entirely a matter for American maintenance. There had been a gradual development tending toward a multilateral responsibility. In the acceptance of the Buenos Aires Convention of 1936 and the Lima Convention of 1938, the multilateral nature of these two understandings were expressed as follows:

In the event of an international war outside America which might menace the peace of the American Republics, such consultation shall also take place to determine the proper time and manner in which the signatory states, if they so desire, may eventually cooperate in some action tending to preserve the peace of the American Continent. "And in case the peace, security, or territorial integrity of an American Republic is thus threatened by acts of any nature that may impair them, they proclaim their common concern, and their determination to make effective their solidarity, coordinating their respective sovereign wills by means of the procedure of consultation, established by conventions in force and by declarations of the Inter-American Conferences, using the measures which in each case the circumstances may make advisable. It is understood that the Governments of the American Republics will act independently in their individual capacity, recognizing fully their juridical equality as sovereign states."

If a European power by an extension of its boundaries takes possession of the territory of one of our neighboring republics against its will and in derogation of its rights, it is difficult to see why to that extent such European power does not thereby attempt to extend its system of government to that portion of this continent which is thus taken. This is the precise action which President Monroe declared to be "dangerous to our peace and safety," and it can make no difference whether the European system is extended by an advance of frontier or otherwise. Practically, the principle for which we contend has peculiar, if not exclusive, relation to the United States. It may not have been admitted in so many words to the code of international law, but since in international councils every nation is entitled to the rights belonging to it, if the enforcement of the Monroe Doctrine is something we may justly claim, it has its place in the code of international law as certainly and as securely as if it were specifically mentioned; and when the United States is a suitor before the high tribunal that administers international law, the question to be determined is whether or not we present claims which the justice of that code of law can find to be right and valid. The Monroe Doctrine finds its recognition in those principles of international law which are based upon the theory that every nation shall have its rights protected and its just claims enforced.

When in 1911 our Secretary of State, Mr. Knox, speaking 100 years after the century-old congressional action referred to previously, declared that "the maintenance of the Monroe Doctrine is considered by us essential to our peace, prosperity, and national safety" he merely made a declaration of a right which under international law is inherent in every independent state.

Not so positive as Cleveland perhaps, Senator Elihu Root said in 1914:

The doctrine is not international law but it rests upon the right of self-protection, and that right is recognized by international law.

And in 1923 another writing, whose tenor was in the same direction as both, came from the pen of then Secretary of State Hughes, now Chief Justice of the United States, in the following words:

The Monroe Doctrine is not a policy of aggression; it is a policy of self-defense. * * * It still remains an assertion of the principle of national security. * * * The decision of the question as to what action the United States should take in any exigency arising in this hemisphere is not controlled by the content of the Monroe Doctrine but may always be determined on the grounds of international right and national security as freely as if the Monroe Doctrine did not exist. * * * The Monroe Doctrine rests "upon the right of every sovereign state to protect itself by preventing a condition of affairs in which it will be too late to protect itself."

The Monroe Doctrine and this resolution now pending must both be considered as fundamental elements of our national defense and are based upon the principle of the right of self-preservation.

It is in this especially that the justification of the Monroe Doctrine will rest in law if further justification is necessary. I—and, of course, I am sure that most of the people of the United States—do not assume that the Monroe Doctrine needs a justification after its over a hundred years of acceptance.

Let us not quibble about the terms "justification as international law" and "justification as international defense." It is in a study of the latter that we prove the former. The equation is a simple one. If we prove the necessity of the Monroe Doctrine as a vital element in our national defense, if we establish it as a prime shield in the preservation of our own Nation from danger, then we have proved its justification in international law. One need not search far into the writings of international lawyers to support this argument. It is found to be the very essence of many of their works. Boiled down, the authorities make the following points: Self-preservation is a national right, absolute and unequivocal. It includes all incidental rights to attain this end. Threatened instability of another government, where it concerns the safety of a given state, is ground for exercise of self-preservation. It is not only a right but a duty to prevent the consequencies of events which another state cannot or declares that it cannot itself control. A clear duty to repress potential dangers, if real, extends even to seeming aggressive though actually defensive action. The text writers go further. They justify positions which in our extremity we surely may never be called upon to take, such as the violation of other nations for our own expediency if our peril is real. I mention these authorities without citing them because by citing innocently and academically I do not want to be guilty of inciting. I pray Heaven we may never need to use all our rights under international law, but they are there. They are our precepts, conceived in the fairness and justice that makes international lawyers lawyers. Whoever could deny the high-minded Monroe Doctrine as international law, after a search into the international law texts with emphasis on self-defense, would be guilty of failing to draw a logical conclusion from a clear premise. The national right of self-defense under international law is the key to the understanding of the Monroe Doctrine as international law.

Self-preservation is the first law of nature to an individual. It is more than this, even, to a government, for an individual may recklessly and wantonly waste his life, but the duly constituted authorities of a government owe a higher duty, because they are impressed with an inviolable trust by the inhabitants of that government. These are my words, but their substance may be found in even a cursory reading of the principles of international law. I subscribe to them wholly, and I repeat my prayer that in an extremity we may never be called upon to use them.

Under the theory of inter-American solidarity national defense for one means national defense for all. Since President Wilson's great pronouncement at Mobile, Ala., on October 27, 1913, which speech gave birth to what has been later called the good-neighbor policy, no American nation has had fear of the "Colossus of the North." The action of many of the American states when we entered the World War in 1917; our refusal to be bound by a neutral stand when war exists between an American nation and a non-American state; incident after incident, in law and in action, in diplomacy and in conference show that understanding in matters of common interest has been easier to attain. The American states like ourselves are tensely nationalistic. Their independence of act, both in right and in fact, is greatly cherished. This is no longer though the problem that it was. Why has this become so? Because no nation wishes to impose itself upon another. The sincerity of Wilson, followed as it has been by the wisdom of Hughes, the honesty of Hull, and the leadership of Roosevelt, all of whom have accepted the moral and spiritual characteristics of Bolivar's great dream. Events in the world plus the inspiration for right may bring that dream's fulfillment sooner than even a prophet would predict. Having said what I have, it would not be proper to leave this thought without quoting from President Wilson:

The future, ladies and gentlemen, is going to be very different for this hemisphere from the past. These states lying to the south of us, which have always been our neighbors, will now be drawn closer to us by innumerable ties, and, I hope, chief of all, by the tie of a common understanding of each other. Interest does not tie nations together; it sometimes separates them. But sympathy and understanding does unite them, and I believe that by the new route that is just about to be opened, while we physically cut two continents asunder, we spiritually unite them. It is a spiritual union which we seek.

Do you not see now what is about to happen? These great tides which have been running along parallels of latitude, and that opening gate at the Isthmus of Panama, will open the world to a commerce that she has not known before, a commerce of intelligence, of thought and sympathy between north and south. The Latin American states, which, to their disadvantage, have been off the main lines, will now be on the main lines. I feel that these gentlemen honoring us with their presence today will presently find that some part, at any rate, of the center of gravity of the world has shifted.

What these States are going to see, therefore, is an emancipation from the subordination, which has been inevitable, to foreign enterprise and an assertion of the splendid character which, in spite of these difficulties, they have again and again been able to demonstrate. The dignity, the courage, the self-possession, the self-respect of the Latin American states, their achievements in the face of all these adverse circumstances, deserve nothing but the admiration and applause of the world. In the future they will draw closer and closer to us because of circumstances of which I wish to speak with moderation, and, I hope, without indiscretion.

We must prove ourselves their friends and champions upon terms of equality and honor. You cannot be friends upon any other terms than upon the terms of honor. We must show ourselves friends by comprehending their interest whether it squares with our own interest or not. It is a very perilous thing to determine the foreign policy of a nation in the terms of material interest. It not only is unfair to those with whom you are dealing, but it is degrading as regards your own actions.

Comprehension must be the soil in which shall grow all the fruits of friendship, and there is a reason and a compulsion lying behind all this which is dearer than anything else to the thoughtful men of America. I mean the development of constitutional liberty in the world. Human rights, national integrity, and opportunity as against material interests—that, ladies and gentlemen, is the issue which we now have to face. I want to take this occasion to say that the United States will never again seek one additional foot of territory by conquest. She will devote herself to showing that she knows how to make honorable and fruitful use of the territory she has, and she must regard it as one of the duties of friendship to see that from no quarter are material interests made superior to human liberty and national opportunity. I say this, not with a single thought that anyone will gainsay it, but merely to fix in our consciousness what our real relationship with the rest of America is. It is the relationship of a family of mankind devoted to the development of true constitutional liberty. We know that that is the soil out of which the best enterprise springs. We know that this is a cause which we are making in common with our neighbors, because we have had to make it for ourselves.

Reference has been made here today to some of the national problems which confront us as a Nation. What is at the heart of all our national problems? It is that we have seen the hand of material interest sometimes about to close upon our dearest rights and possessions. We have seen material interests threaten constitutional freedom in the United States. Therefore we will now know how to sympathize with those in the rest of America who have to contend with such powers, not only within their borders but from outside their borders also.

I know what the response of the thought and heart of America will be to the program I have outlined, because America was created to realize a program like that. This is not America because it is rich. This is not America because it has set up for a great population great opportunities of material prosperity. America is a name which sounds in the ears of men everywhere as a synonym with individual opportunity because it is a synonym of individual liberty. I would rather belong to a poor nation that was free than to a rich nation that had ceased to be in love with liberty. But we shall not be poor if we love liberty, because the nation that loves liberty truly sets every man free to do his best and be his best, and that means the release of all the splendid energies of a great people who think for themselves. A nation of employees cannot be free any more than a nation of employers can be.

In emphasizing the points which must unite us in sympathy and in spiritual interest with the Latin American peoples we are only emphasizing the points of our own life, and we should prove ourselves untrue to our own traditions if we proved ourselves untrue friends to them. Do not think, therefore, gentlemen, that the questions of the day are mere questions of policy and diplomacy. They are shot through with the principles of life. We dare not turn from the principle that morality and not expediency is the thing that must guide us and that we will never condone iniquity because it is most convenient to do so. It seems to me that this is a day of infinite hope, of confidence in a future greater than the past has been, for I am fain to believe that in spite of all the things that we wish to correct the nineteenth century that now lies behind us has brought us a long stage toward the time when, slowly ascending the tedious climb that leads to the final uplands, we shall get our ultimate view of the duties of mankind. We have breasted a considerable part of that climb and shall presently—it may be a generation or two—come out upon those great heights where there shines unobstructed the light of the justice of God.

Everything that I said before, quoting President Wilson, of course applies with equal force to all the Americas as to the United States. Our danger, if there is danger, is common. There has been resentment south of us at times against the Monroe Doctrine. This is changing. The doctrine is becoming multilateral, and as it grows in this direction security will be seen to be common security. What applies to security for one applies to security for all because the alarm is universal in this hemisphere. I say this in passing because when I speak of a right I mean a collective right in the Americas as well as an individual national right in the United States alone. I am coming to the multilateral aspects of the Monroe Doctrine later in this talk.

The next consideration, if we have established the Monroe Doctrine as based upon international law, is the antecedents to the doctrine.

That which became the Monroe Doctrine truly had its birth in the American Declaration of Independence. Jefferson in 1793 clearly foresaw an America of no European political affiliation.

Before Monroe's statement on March 25, 1818, Clay, an apostle of the Spanish Americas, had said:

> Within this vast region we behold the most sublime and interesting objects of creation; the loftiest mountains, the most majestic rivers in the world; the richest mines of the precious metals; and the choicest productions of the earth. We behold there a spectacle still more interesting and sublime—the glorious spectacle of eighteen millions of people struggling to burst their chains and be free—adding that in the establishment of their independence the United States had the deepest interest, and that once independent these governments would be animated by an American feeling and guided by an American policy. They would, he predicted, obey the laws of the New World in contradistinction to those of Europe. In Clay's speeches of 1817 and 1818, Monroe was sympathetically aroused, but deferred his action under the opposition of Adams and Calhoun.

Background for the Monroe Doctrine? One might get it from a hundred interlocking sources.

Jefferson's statement has been the American theory and the American practice, and is to this day American tradition. Never once have we mingled in European political affairs in the sense of becoming a party to those affairs. Our Army and our Navy have gone to Europe; American soldiers have fought in Europe; we have fought side by side with European armies in Europe and in Asia. We have had joint objectives, but never once has there been an entanglement. America has associated herself, but never once has she been willing to fuse her strictly American stand with Europe's. When we went to the Mediterranean and attacked Barbary pirates, we did so in defense of our own rights. When we entered the European War, we did so because the war had been brought to us. We had been attacked. Our ships had been sunk. Our property had been violated, and American lives had been lost. The locale for fighting, the selection of the soil, and the sea lanes, were simply matters of military convenience. Probably all thoughtful persons are thankful that the military strategy of the hour was such as to take the frightful scenes from our very sight.

Our entry into the World War may have been a mistake as so many people insist, but it was no more in opposition to the American position against entangling ourselves in the broils of Europe than was our expedition against the pirates or our expedition against the Chinese Boxers. America never has "entangled" herself and never intends to do so. She has a mission and a destiny in this world quite distinct from the mission and destiny of non-American states.

Washington's Farewell Address is too well known to be quoted here. But it is fundamental to the evolution of America's defensive policy. President Adams in 1797, in a message to Congress, said:

> We ought not to involve ourselves in the political system of Europe, but to keep ourselves always distinct and separate from it.

The American Monroe Doctrine always has been just an American doctrine. The nonentanglement doctrine has been also always an American doctrine. To show just how much this was understood by the fathers, in 1798 our Minister to Great Britain reported that Great Britain desired, with our cooperation, to separate South America from Spain, Great Britain then not wanting to see France secure the resources of those colonies. But although 25 years later, by our own act, we sustained the severing of many of the South American states from Spain, we were not a party to any European country in accomplishing this. At the same time that our American Minister reported England's desire to cooperate with us in the separation of Spanish colonies from Spain, our Minister is said to have replied that America would live to see Louisiana pass into the hands of new proprietors, but nothing was done about it; and when finally the United States purchased Louisiana, that purchase was consummated by an American act, and not in cooperation with any other state.

By 1800 the theory that America would resent the transfer of American territory from any non-American state to another non-American state had gained almost universal recognition in this country. Our same Minister, speaking about the Floridas, said:

> We should be unwilling to see them transferred except to ourselves.

In the same year, Madison, our Secretary of State, informed our Minister in Madrid that the United States never had favored and could not favor the transfer to Great Britain of the Spanish possessions in the Mississippi, and the instructions which Secretary Madison sent had the assent of President Jefferson. In 1802 Jefferson wrote to Livingston in Paris. Livingston was one of the commission of five that had cooperated with Jefferson in writing the Declaration of Independence, although I think he did not sign it. Let me make my point by quoting from former Under Secretary of State J. Reuben Clark's memorandum to the Secretary of State:

> Jefferson himself, writing to Livingston at Paris (1802), declared the cession of the Floridas and Louisiana "works most sorely on the United States"; that it "completely reverses all the political relations of the United States"; and that by it France "assumes to us the attitude of defiance" and makes "it impossible that France and the United States can continue long friends." Madison, writing Livingston with the approval of Jefferson, at about the same time, declared that "mere neighborhood could not be friendly" to the harmony of France and the United States. Lord Hawkesbury (1802) inquired of King as to the "line of policy" which the United States would adopt if France acquired Louisiana. In a memoir which he delivered to French authorities (1802), Livingston again spoke of the dangers of neighborhood; and in the latter part of the year (1802) Madison wrote to Pinckney in Madrid of the "injuries" coming to us on account of the "colonial officers scattered over the hemisphere and in our neighborhood."

By 1820 came one of the two incidents directly responsible for President Monroe's pronouncement. I refer to the claim of the Russian Government of the exclusive right of Russian ships off northwest America above 51° latitude.

In the diplomatic exchange which naturally followed, John Quincy Adams, then Secretary of State, enunciated the principle that since the entire area of the Western Hemisphere had been occupied, no European government could claim to have a right to establish colonies therein. Monroe, of course, is seen to have adopted this opinion. A second reason lay in the fear of European conquest of the infant republics of South America. Adams, it will be noted in passing, called the position of the United States "extra-European" politically and said that our system and the European system should be "kept as separate and distinct from one another as possible."

In quoting Adams' words one cannot refrain from pointing out that America now, in a sense, remains the same. By this I mean that when in the adoption of our Constitution the Federal Government guaranteed to each of the States a republican form of government we once more emphasized a theory which was to become fundamentally and traditionally American whenever we think of American destiny in the world. Russia was warned by Adams that Russian settlement on the American continent would be against the future peace of the world and in fact against Russia's own interests. This was before the Monroe Doctrine was enunciated.

So we spoke the essence of the doctrine to Russia and to Great Britain. Great Britain accepted the theory in so many words by disavowing the slightest designs on the infant republics.

We have Great Britain's recognition of the Monroe Doctrine before the pronouncement was even made. The Russian controversy was disposed of in the flat terms of the first of the two paragraphs which is the Monroe Doctrine itself, enunciated by President Monroe on December 2, 1823.

It may be well herein to state the doctrine in the language of its author. President Monroe stated:

> 1. At the proposal of the Russian Imperial Government, made through the minister of the Emperor residing here, a full power and instructions have been transmitted to the minister of the United States at St. Petersburg to arrange by amicable negotiations the respective rights and interests of the two nations on the northwest coast of this continent. A similar proposal had been made by His Imperial Majesty to the Government of Great Britain, which has likewise been acceded to. The Government of the United States has been desirous by this friendly proceeding of manifesting the great value which they have invariably attached to the friendship of the Emperor and their solicitude to cultivate the best understanding with his government. In the discussions to which this interest has given rise and in the arrangements by which they may terminate the occasion has been judged proper for asserting, as a principle in which the rights and interests of the United States are involved, that the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintained, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power.
> 2. In the wars of the European powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparation for our defense. With the movements in this hemisphere we are of necessity more immediately connected, and by causes which must be obvious to all enlightened and impartial observers. The political system of the Allied powers is essentially different in this respect from that of America. This difference proceeds from that which exists in their respective governments; and to the defense of our own, which has been achieved by the loss of so much blood and treasure, and matured by the wisdom of their most enlightened citizens, and under which we have enjoyed unexampled felicity, this whole Nation is devoted. We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere. But with the governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States. In the war between those new governments and Spain we declared our neutrality at the time of their recognition, and to this we have adhered, and shall continue to adhere, provided no change shall occur which, in the judgment of the competent authorities of this Government, shall make a corresponding change on the part of the United States indispensable to their security.

This resolution has been but a reiteration and development of America's peace policy from the very beginning. Each of its aims is in reality older than President Monroe's pronouncement.

Two statements of Monroe are of exceeding importance. One is the statement that—

> We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety.

The reference to "powers" was to European allied interests of the time.

The second presently important conclusion by President Monroe was contained in his words:

> With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere.

These are indeed the very essences of the resolution now before us, a resolution not more sudden or disturbing than is reading to refresh the mind with the facts of our own national history.

After the doctrine was declared we have its natural evolution. The first information we have is that it was received throughout the United States with great enthusiasm. But we were not then ready to proceed to make the understanding multilateral for we recall that Bolivar in 1826 sought closer cooperation between American states; the people of the United States clearly were cool to having any understanding with the young republics.

Texas came into the United States on a reassertion of the Monroe Doctrine, in spite of Great Britain's and France's opposition. No less was it invoked in our difficulty with Great Britain over northwest boundaries, or fear of British designs on California. It is needless to say the doctrine was at least a profitable one to us. President Polk warned against armed intervention and diplomatic interference, and the doctrine was enlarged in these dimensions, and foreign assumption of a Yucatan protectorate was inveighed against. In the sixties this country failed in one assertion, and outmaneuvered a dangerous situation to win in another.

Before 1870 it was said that territories in the New World could not be transferred from one European power to another, an interesting point in view of our present discussion. In fact President Grant is credited with effectiveness on this point, and threats of territorial cession brought forward repeated and successful assertions then. The doctrine prevented strangers from cutting through the Isthmus of Panama and added diplomatic to our engineering spurs as it came about that we built the Canal.

In early modern times we have used the doctrine under Cleveland to compel a European power to arbitrate a boundary dispute between its colony, British Guiana, and Venezuela. The assertion gave us a tense and worried hour, but when it was seen to hold the Monroe Doctrine also was seen to have grown. Theodore Roosevelt's utility of the doctrine in an attempt to prevent European punishment to "unruly" Latin American states is an interesting variation of the application of the doctrine.

But with the coming of Woodrow Wilson and his great speech at Mobile, Ala., delivered on October 27, 1913, we marked the birth of what has been called the "good-neighbor policy," and there took place the expansion of the idea wherein America herself renounced any thought of an ambition for any more territory. This was the beginning of the emergence to the Americas of the United States, not as the "Colossus of the North," as we had been called in scorn or fear, but as a great nation.

Truly this was a development of the Monroe Doctrine—such a development as may bring to us in timely arrival a multilateral accord such as to make the American nations, standing together, impervious to even the slightest "fifth column" infiltrations. We know from historians and contemporary newspapers that the Monroe Doctrine, viewed south of us, has been seen with mixed gratitude and suspicion, the latter accentuated by such events as our refusal four times in its first 4 years of existence to give fuller commitments to Latin-American nations—when we were hostile to Bolivar's splendid efforts in the 1826 so-called Panama congress. In fact, it never has been widely popular except within our own borders. We have never given a good answer to the Latin American complaint, oft-repeated, that the doctrine always has been interpreted solely by the United States. Since Wilson little contribution has been made to overcome this feeling except lately, and except also Charles Evans Hughes' divorcing the doctrine from international law, to debit the latter, not the former, with our repeated intercessions in the Caribbean. But this served only to stem unpopularizing and, while doing some good negatively, strengthened the doctrine only by not weakening it.

In 1929 the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, submitting the Kellogg-Briand Pact, conservatively interpreted the Monroe Doctrine and very wisely and very properly based its authority upon self-defense. But the doctrine may not be popularized by playing it down, or by limiting self-defense to our own territorial borders. As I said in my previous remarks, self-defense is the very essence of the Monroe Doctrine as international law. Self-defense, to be practical, and to be popular, and to elicit support where support may be direly needed, means self-defense for the whole of us, in spirit as in deed. In events to come it may stand or fall upon its popularity south of us. Indeed, we may stand or fall by the same unity, or lack of it.

If our record with the Americas were better we could propose joint and cooperative action of many types at the present moment to the advantage of all. In fact, I believe firmly that by joint action we should all undertake to guarantee the status quo among the American Republics in addition to passing this timely resolution now before us. But we have been suspected. We have been resented. We have done much but have not quite erased that "Colossus of the North" appelation. Are we imperialistic? Do we want to annex nations? Of course not, and thoughtful statesmen are beginning to understand and appreciate us as the professed good neighbor that we really are. Time would do all things, but we have not time, and we are left with problems. Today, solemnly, we may hope to solve some of them.

The states of the Americas are, fortunately, as nationalistic as we. In our Pan-American agreements independent actions always have been stressed, and this emphasis is wise. This is one reason for making the deduction made in the Senate report to accompany this resolution and place it on the calendar, wherein we say:

> It is understood that the governments of the American Republics will act independently in their individual capacity, recognizing fully their judicial equality as sovereign states.

This resolution is a restatement of some of the genius of the Monroe Doctrine rather than a new concept. It is wholly consistent with our theory of national defense. More, it is consistent with our highest aims in inter-American cooperation. Unity in the Americas, I hope we may never have to prove, is truly more than mere sentiment.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair), as in executive session, laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting several nominations in the Army, and a convention, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

CONFIRMATION OF ANDREW W. HOCKENHULL AS POSTMASTER AT CLOVIS, N. MEX.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, as in executive session, I report favorably from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads the nomination of Andrew W. Hockenhull to be postmaster at Clovis, N. Mex., and I ask unanimous consent for the consideration and confirmation of the nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the nomination is confirmed.

MAURICE LÉON

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a short statement as to the background of Maurice Léon, whose letter, This Is America's War, was placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD Saturday by the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> Who is Maurice Léon?
> When readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD read their Saturday's issue, they may have read the letter of Maurice Léon in which he takes the position that we had a treaty with France to assist her when attacked by Germany. Of course, it is known by all that a treaty to be binding must be ratified by the United States Senate and this was not.
> However, that is not the reason for this statement. I feel the people of my country have a right to know the truth about the background of these individuals who are promoting a propaganda drive to involve us in the war. Who are they? What is their interest?
> As to Maurice Léon, one will find that he was born in Beirut, Lebanon Territory, and emigrated to the United States. He was educated in Paris, France. In his Who's Who biography, he shows that he considers his activity preceding our entrance into the World War as one if not the most important part of his life. He says that he "secured for the French Government its first war loans in the United States, $10,000,000 in November 1914 and $25,000,000 in April 1915, first allied war bonds on the American market."
> That was the first war loan to France after her entrance in the 1914–18 World War. It is a part of the $4,220,036,473 owed by France to the United States.
> History points to the tremendous influence the loans had on our involvement in that conflict.
> In the hearings of the Munitions Committee, one finds that Frank Vanderlip, president of the National City Bank, spoke about the presence of Mr. Léon on the mission to get this loan.
> It is not that one objects to his taking the present position that he does. But his background and his past connections show that he has been interested in our involvement previously. As I showed on the floor of the Senate, many of those speaking for our present involvement in the war in Europe are and have been interested in our past involvement. Let the people have the facts.
> This drive to get us in the war is not spontaneous. It is being generated by paid forces. Let Congress investigate them. After the American soldiers are killed on the battlefield, it will be too late to start such an investigation.

RECESS

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock a. m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Tuesday, June 18, 1940, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, JUNE 17, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. William Bashford Richards, D. D., pastor of the Delhi Methodist Church, Cincinnati, Ohio, offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, our Divine Father, alpha and omega, beginning and the end, Thou who hast created in Thine own image man, and set him in the universe as its jewel, we present ourselves to Thee for Thy guidance and benediction. Declare Thyself to us in ideals and consciences that disturb our self-complacency and that will lift us toward nobler personal living. We lift before Thee our care for our Nation. Thanks be to Thee for the great men in ages past who have saved Thy people, men like unto ourselves, who have been willing to remove themselves head and shoulders above the multitude to make tremendous sacrifices for high principles and, having done all, to stand. Today give us again such leadership. Save us as a people from trust in violence, realizing that only through spiritual ends can be the establishment of that which is spiritually good.

May Thy benediction rest upon all agencies that seek to establish world peace and the brotherhood of man against strife and war. This we ask in the Spirit of Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, June 14, 1940, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 9909. An act to amend sections 2803 (c) and 2903 of the Internal Revenue Code.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H. J. Res. 544. Joint resolution making appropriations for work relief and relief, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 5138. An act to make unlawful attempts to interfere with the discipline of the Army, the Navy, and the Coast Guard; to require the deportation of certain classes of aliens; to require the fingerprinting of aliens seeking to enter the United States; and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the foregoing bill, requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. CONNALLY, Mr. MILLER, and Mr. DANAHER to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 9958. An act to authorize the purchase by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of stock of Federal home-loan banks; to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendment to the foregoing bill, requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. WAGNER, Mr. BARKLEY, and Mr. TOWNSEND to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5982) entitled "An act for the protection against unlawful use of the badge, medal, emblem, or other insignia of veterans' organizations incorporated by act of Congress, and providing penalties for the violation thereof."

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House to a bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 4027. An act to transfer the active list of the Construction Corps to the line of the Navy, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. BARKLEY and Mr. GIBSON members of the Joinst Select Committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of executive papers in the following departments and agencies:

1. Department of Agriculture.
2. Department of the Interior.
3. Department of Justice.
4. Department of the Navy.
5. Department of the Treasury.
6. Post Office Department.
7. Civil Aeronautics Authority.
8. Federal Security Agency, Office of Education.
9. Federal Works Agency, Public Buildings Administration.
10. Federal Works Agency, Work Projects Administration.

INDEBTEDNESS OF THE REPUBLIC OF FINLAND

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce that, pursuant to the authority granted him on Friday, June 14, 1940, he did, on June 15, 1940, sign the enrolled joint resolution of the Senate, Senate Joint Resolution 272, to authorize the postponement of payment due the United States by the Republic of Finland.

RELIEF APPROPRIATIONS, 1941

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House Joint Resolution 544, making appropriations for work relief and relief for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees: Mr. TAYLOR, Mr. CANNON of Missouri, Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia, Mr. LUDLOW, Mr. SNYDER, Mr. O'NEAL, Mr. JOHNSON of West Virginia, Mr. POWERS, Mr. WIGGLESWORTH, Mr. LAMBERTSON, and Mr. DITTER.

WAR DEPARTMENT CIVIL FUNCTIONS, 1941

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 8668) making appropriations for the nonmilitary establishments, with Senate amendments thereto, further insist on the disagreement of the House to the Senate amendments, and agree to the further conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees: Mr. SNYDER, Mr. TERRY, Mr. STARNES of Alabama, Mr. COLLINS, Mr. KERR, Mr. MAHON, Mr. POWERS, Mr. ENGEL, and Mr. CASE of South Dakota.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a telegram received this morning.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include an address delivered by Attorney General Jackson at Charlottesville, Va., June 14, 1940.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD in two particulars, one to include an article by former Congressman John McGroarty, and the other an article from the American Legion magazine.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

AGRICULTURAL IMPORTS

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[Mr. O'CONNOR addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix of the RECORD.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a radio address delivered by the Solicitor General.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFITH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein two short concurrent resolutions which were passed by the Legislature of the State of Louisiana memorializing the Congress of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and to include articles on the "fifth column" by the Reverend Rembert Gilman Smith.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include therein a short editorial from the Gaelic American, of New York City, entitled "How England Has Scrapped Treaties."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and therein to include three editorials from the New York Times, the Washington Post, and the St. Louis Star Times, relating to the Harry Bridges case.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include a resolution of the Board of Commissioners of the city of Newport, Ky.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include therein a speech by the Assistant Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE SUGAR ACT

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, vitally important to our State of Colorado and to 16 other States producing beet sugar is the bill (H. R. 9654) to extend to December 31, 1941, the provisions of the Sugar Act of 1937. Tomorrow, Tuesday, June 18, this bill will be brought before the House under a special rule. I trust that all of our friends will be present tomorrow in order to help adopt the rule and insure the passage of H. R. 9654. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include therein a letter written by me to the Desert News of Utah.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

HON. JONATHAN BOURNE, JR.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[Mr. PIERCE addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix of the RECORD.]

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include a letter recently written by Hon. Jonathan Bourne, Jr., to the Herald Tribune in New York, published as a part of my remarks, and I ask that it all be extended in the Appendix of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include an editorial from the Washington Post.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. PITTENGER, by unanimous consent, was granted permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

HARRY BRIDGES

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw your attention to the 14 ships tied up in San Pedro Harbor. Some of those ships have materials on them that would be used in our defense program.

I also want to call attention to the fact that this situation is the result of a row between Bridges' C. I. O. water-front organization. This shows what this man Bridges has been doing. I believe we have dignified him when we called him a "fifth columnist." I believe the time has come when we can call a spade a spade, and we should now call these traitors by their first names, the traitors that they are.

Thank you. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

COL. CHARLES A. LINDBERGH

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute, and to extend my remarks by inserting a radio address made by Colonel Lindbergh on Saturday evening.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

[Mr. KNUTSON addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix of the RECORD.]

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include in my remarks the answer of Senator PITTMAN to Colonel Lindbergh.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I heard the speech of Senator PITTMAN last night, and I think it was one of the worst speeches that any man could possibly utter. It was ridiculous, foolish, and it was downright insane for a man to make a speech like that against Colonel Lindbergh. I object to such a speech as that going into the RECORD.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one-half minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] or any other gentleman is going to object to any speech being put into the RECORD, or to anyone extending his remarks, then that will apply to all Members of the House.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection, but I still maintain it was a terrible speech.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a short article from the Christian Science Monitor on a movement initiated by Portland Post, No. 1, of the veterans to have a flag in every American home.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a letter from the Secretary of the California Farm Bureau Federation.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

[Mr. ALEXANDER addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix of the RECORD.]

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to insert all of the letter referred to.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

STRIKE-BOUND WEST COAST SHIPPING

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I read for the information of the House a telegram addressed to me by the Los Angeles Steamship Association, as follows:

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., June 14, 1940.

Hon. Representative SMITH of Virginia,
National Labor Relations Board, Washington, D. C.:

Through a jurisdictional dispute between C. I. O. and A. F. of L., Consolidated Shipbuilding Corporation at Long Beach, engaged in construction four ships Maritime Commission, now picketed by C. I. O. This morning, in retaliation, A. F. of L. picketed all docks in harbor, with result A. F. of L. truck drivers refuse pass picket line and Marine Firemen's Union on American ship refuse keep steam up and threaten leave ships. This has tied up this port. Fourteen American ships now idle and others ships will avoid calling here, resulting in complete stagnation all water-borne commerce, including handicap to airplane industry, ship construction, and other features national defense. This intolerable situation over which we have no control and earnestly request you use best efforts have C. I. O. picket lines withdraw Consolidated Corporation and A. F. of L. picket line withdraw from docks.

LOS ANGELES STEAMSHIP ASSOCIATION.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one-half minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, apropos to what the gentleman from Virginia has just said, I wish again to say that to strike against the Government in time of stress or to strike against any essential work of the Government under such conditions is, in fact, treason and it ought so to be declared by law.

[Here the gavel fell.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio address I made last night over a national hook-up in reply to Walter Winchell.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

[Mr. THORKELSON addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix of the RECORD.]

SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO]?

There was no objection.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, a morning newspaper carries the information that on last Saturday night in the State of Michigan an attempt was made to blow up an ammunition train and to destroy the railroad tunnel which connects the State of Michigan with the Dominion of Canada between Sarnia, Ontario, and Port Huron, Mich. The attempt was made by boring holes in the bottom of a freight car, stuffing oil-soaked rags through the holes, and setting the car on fire. The attempt missed the ammunition train by a few minutes but they did get a car containing airplane motors which were on their way to Canada.

If there is any doubt in the mind of any person in this country that we do not have subversive interests actively at work and that the "fifth column" actually exists in the United States, this piece of information ought to remove that doubt at once and forever. [Applause.]

THE AMERICAN LEGION ON PREPAREDNESS AND INTERVENTION

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE]?

There was no objection.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I desire to read three or four sentences from a special message by Raymond J. Kelly, national commander of the American Legion, appearing in the National Legionnaire, expressing the official viewpoint of the national organization in the present emergency:

For 20 long years the Legion raised its voice to the highest pitch in the effort to arouse the Nation to the need for an adequate national defense. Few listened.

There is no change in the official position of the American Legion in regard to the neutrality of the United States. * * * The Legion believes in the protection at all hazards of the free peoples of the Western Hemisphere as our primary obligation.

* * * While we are ill-equipped to provide even a minimum of protection for the Monroe Doctrine, it is idle to consider the feasibility of entering into the great conflict across the Atlantic. With what would we intervene? How would we make our potential strength felt short of 2 or 3 years? * * * The safety of America transcends any political issue.

[Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to place the entire article by Mr. Kelly in the Appendix of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE]?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHIFFLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include an editorial on Our Flag.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. SCHIFFLER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHIFFLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include a radio address made by my colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTON].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. SCHIFFLER]?

There was no objection.

SOLICITATION OF ADVERTISING FOR THE 1940 DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION BOOK

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BENDER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, a substantial citizen of Cleveland writes me as follows:

Of course, you have heard, perhaps from many sources, the tactics being used by solicitors of "advertising" in the 1940 Democratic Convention Book. There are several methods used here which are arousing the animosity of the person solicited and should, if possible, be written into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

One method employed is a telegram sent by the Democratic National Committee, Washington, to the person to be solicited, stating that a solicitor will call on him in connection with a matter of considerable interest to the corporation to be solicited. In most cases the corporation solicited is working on Government contracts, either as principal contractor or subcontractor. Two solicitors are operating in Cleveland, and practically stating to such corporations that unless they take out advertising space they need not expect to ever again quote on Government work. In some cases the statements are made clearly and without equivocation. In other cases the language is more guarded, but the same implication is present. W. J. Bright and Art White are reported to be solicitors in greater Cleveland.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. JOHNSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include an address delivered by Howard W. Bessy before the annual convention of the Virginia Coal Merchants' Association.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JOHNSON]?

There was no objection.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include a short editorial.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. VREELAND]?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINTER asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROSS].

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I have been listening on the radio and reading in the newspapers trying to follow the President in his international dealings, and I hear him using the term "I" so much that I, with the rest of the American people, am beginning to wonder why the State Department, Congress, and he are not cooperating. I am sure the country would feel much more at ease if he would say, "We have done thus and so by way of the Department of State." I wonder if it is possible that the President has lost confidence in certain departments of the Government that he is assuming so much responsibility himself. In the last few years I have heard so much from the "I's" in Germany and in Italy that it makes me sick to hear it in the United States of America. There is no reason why we should be interested so much in Europe's war. It is just one more of their wars. In 1806 Napoleon rode into Berlin as a conqueror. In 1870 Bismarck rode into Paris as a conqueror. In 1918 Clemenceau rode over Germany in the Versailles Treaty; and in 1940 Hitler rode into Paris as a conqueror. During all those years from 1806 to 1940 America went ahead. And I think we will keep going ahead without so much "I."

[Here the gavel fell.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include two tables issued by the War Department.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SHAFER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein an editorial from this morning's Washington Post.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein an editorial by Gen. Hugh Johnson.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein an editorial.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, why risk our involvement in war by maintaining two American cruisers and four destroyers at Lisbon, Portugal, in the midst of the war zone? Suppose a German or Italian submarine takes a potshot, mistaking them for Allied warships? It is likely to happen in the war zone. I am informed that our warships have no American flags painted on their sides and use no spotlights on the flag at night. Why look for trouble by ordering these warships into the war zone? It must be embarrassing to little Portugal, who wants to keep out of the European war.

Why use Lisbon as a base, without any urgent need, and run the risk of having our cruisers sunk to add fuel to the war hysteria and increase the booming of the war drums in America?

At any rate American merchant ships have finally been ordered out of the Mediterranean and on the basis of better late than never we can heave a sigh of relief and let it go at that. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a statement by the United Government Employees, Inc.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include therein certain resolutions adopted by the State Democratic convention recently held in Mississippi endorsing President Roosevelt for a third term and Senator Pat Harrison for Vice President.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein some election statements.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include therein a short tabulation prepared by myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. This is Consent Calendar day. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Consent Calendar.

PASSAMAQUODDY BAY

The Clerk called the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 57) authorizing the Secretary of War to cause a completion of surveys, test borings, and foundation investigations to be made to determine the advisability and cost of putting in a small experimental plant for development of tidal power in the waters in and about Passamaquoddy Bay, the cost thereof to be paid from appropriations heretofore or hereafter made for such examinations.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

TOLL BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSOURI RIVER, OMAHA, NEBR.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 7069, authorizing Douglas County, Nebr., to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Missouri River at or near Florence Station, in the city of Omaha, Nebr.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OF CROP-LOAN LAW

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 7878, to amend the crop-loan law relating to the lien imposed thereunder, and for other purposes.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

COMPENSATION FOR SPECIAL COUNSEL OF THE UNITED STATES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4366, to authorize the payment of additional compensation to special assistants to the Attorney General in the case of United States against Doheny executors.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, there being a minority report on this bill, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

CHANGING THE TIME OF APPOINTMENT OF PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS AND THE ELECTION OF SENATORS AND REPRESENTATIVES IN CONGRESS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8700, to change the time of the appointment of Presidential electors and the election of Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

PRINTING OF SPEECHES AND WRITINGS OF EDMUND BURKE AS A HOUSE DOCUMENT

The Clerk called the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 307) to provide for the printing of the speeches and writings of Edmund Burke as a House document.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

SLUM CLEARANCE IN ALASKA

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8884, to authorize the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska to create a public corporate authority to undertake slum clearance and projects to provide dwelling accommodations for families of low income and to issue bonds and other obligations of the authority for such purpose, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio, Mr. CLEVENGER, Mr. GROSS, and Mr. RICH objected.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE AT GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE

The Clerk called the next bill, Senate Joint Resolution 71, relating to pay to certain employees of the Government Printing Office for uncompensated leave earned during the fiscal year 1932.

Mr. RICH, Mr. CRAWFORD, and Mr. TABER objected.

BIOGRAPHICAL DIRECTORY OF THE AMERICAN CONGRESS

The Clerk called the next business, House Concurrent Resolution 54, authorizing the printing of a revised edition of the Biographical Directory of the American Congress up to and including the Seventy-sixth Congress.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

TEMPORARY DETAIL OF J. L. SAVAGE

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 7254, authorizing the temporary detail of J. L. Savage, an employee of the United States, to service under the Government of the State of New South Wales, Australia.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is there anybody here to explain this bill?

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I might state to the gentleman that John Savage, who is an employee of our Government in the Bureau of Reclamation of the Department of the Interior, has been the supervising engineer for a large number of dams throughout the United States. He has constructed over a billion dollars' worth of such projects in this country during past years. Agents from Australia and from India have come to the United States to inspect some of these dams with a view to constructing similar projects in their own countries. Mr. Savage was detailed to go with them and show them about the United States in their inspection of the dams throughout the country. They have specifically requested that he be detailed to temporary duty in Australia, as well as in India, in order that he might aid them in devising plans for such construction in their own countries. It is at the instance of the Department of the Interior that the bill was introduced and reported favorably by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. In view of the fact that Australia is at war today, does the gentleman believe it would conform to American neutrality to pass this special act and have a high official of the United States Government placed on the pay roll and render services for Australia, which country is at war at this very moment?

Mr. TABER. I do not know that I can see any connection between neutrality and this being done, if we are just providing engineering services for a job that is to be done by them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I object to this unneutral bill, Mr. Speaker.

There being no further objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States is authorized, if he finds that the public interest renders such a course advisable, to detail J. L. Savage, chief designing engineer of the Bureau of Reclamation, Department of the Interior, for temporary service under the Government of the State of New South Wales, Australia. Such detail, if authorized by the President, shall be made in accordance with and subject to the provisions of the act of May 25, 1938 (52 Stat. 442), as amended May 3, 1939 (Public, No. 63, 76th Cong.).

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 8, strike out the period after the word "Australia" and insert "and the Government of the Punjab, India."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the temporary detail of John L. Savage, an employee of the United States, to service under the Government of the State of New South Wales, Australia, and the Government of the Punjab, India."

ROME UNIVERSAL EXPOSITION, 1942

The Clerk called House Joint Resolution 486, authorizing the acceptance of the invitation of the Government of Italy to participate in the Rome Universal Exposition to be held at Rome, Italy, in 1942.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, as this exposition has been indefinitely postponed, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the resolution be laid upon the table. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TWO MOUNTS FOR CAVALRY OFFICERS

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 5478) to provide for the maintenance, at public expense, of two mounts for officers of the Regular Army who are designated as mount officers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object to ask whoever is in charge of this bill some questions. Why should we want two horses now for a Cavalry officer? Is not that somewhat out of date?

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, the War Department has requested this legislation in view of the fact that practically all of the officers of the Cavalry now have two horses which they use in connection with their duties. The law provides for only one at Government expense. However, it is found that a second mount is necessary, and for that reason practically all of the officers do maintain at their own expense a second mount, although this second mount is used for military purposes. As a result, the Department feels that it is not fair to the officer to call upon him to take care of that additional amount out of his own pocket. The second mount is used for military purposes, and the Department feels that the Government should stand the cost, and as a result has requested the introduction of this legislation and its favorable consideration by the Congress.

Mr. RICH. Does not the gentleman think that today, with mechanized warfare, horses are inadequate as implements of war?

Mr. COSTELLO. There are certain types of terrain over which a horse is still the only feasible means of transportation. There are certain activities that horses can perform better than any other means of transportation. In good terrain tanks are satisfactory, but there are places where a tank cannot go where a horse can go. As a result, the gentleman will find that no particular military weapon ever becomes obsolete. All we do is to multiply the types, or add to them, but you can never entirely eliminate any of them when once introduced into military science.

Mr. RICH. Will these horses be used for military work, or are they for riding outside for pleasure?

Mr. COSTELLO. My understanding is that the second mount is to be used for military purposes. I am quite sure if the gentleman checks up on the use of horses he will find there is very little polo playing or other social activities which are carried on on horseback.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COSTELLO. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. So that we might not go back to the "horse and buggy" days, I believe the gentleman will get his bill passed if he will favor an amendment to provide these high officers with one horse and one motorcycle. Let them use the motorcycle when they need it and ride the horse when they need it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SPRINGER, Mr. HORTON, and Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin objected.

DELIVERY OF FIRST-CLASS MAIL MATTER

The Clerk called the bill (S. 3667) providing for the local delivery rate on certain first-class mail matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOSER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. THILL and Mr. SECCOMBE objected to the present consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Three objections are required.

Mr. SECCOMBE. Mr. Speaker, I withhold my objection.

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, I withhold my objection.

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the objections come too late.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to be lenient about that. They have withheld their objections.

Mr. CHURCH. I understand there were three objections and the gentlemen are withholding their objections. Would the chairman of the committee accept an amendment to strike out the last line? If so, I will offer that amendment. I do not object to this bill.

Mr. BARRY. I ask that the amendment be read.

Mr. CHURCH. While I am on my feet, the amendment merely strikes out the last proviso, "provided, such county is entirely within the corporate limits of the city." In that way other counties—Cook County, Ill.; Los Angeles County, Calif.; and Hennepin County, Minn.; and other counties—could get the benefit of this legislation. I hope this amendment is acceptable. I am hoping that the three objectors will withhold their objections.

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield.

Mr. BARRY. The gentleman's amendment entirely destroys this bill, which is designed to equalize the situation in New York City, where four counties, or boroughs, have a

2-cent postal rate within their confines, and one county, wholly within the corporate city, the county of Queens, has four separate areas where the people are paying a 3-cent rate. I discussed this bill with the gentleman. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has held complete hearings and has reported it out unanimously on three occasions. The House has passed it twice. The gentleman's amendment defeats the entire purpose of the bill, and we might just as well have no bill at all.

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield.

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. As I understand the gentleman's amendment, it will affect Los Angeles County in this respect: Outlying points within that county will receive the benefit of the 2-cent postage rates within that area?

Mr. CHURCH. That is right. The same thing will apply to Cook County, Ill., a part of which I have the honor to represent; also Hennepin County, Minneapolis, Minn. As I have stated, I do not object to this bill. I have a lot of sympathy for the gentleman's position, but, in view of the objections, then it seems to me the gentleman should want the bill with this amendment, and then his county, which is entirely within the city of New York—and that is what this bill does with this proviso in it—his city will get the benefit of this bill as amended by my amendment. Then Cook County, Ill., Hennepin County, Minn., and Los Angeles County will get the benefit of the legislation also; and, it seems to me, that those counties are just as compact and just as much entitled to the benefit of this legislation. The bill has always been prepared that way.

Mr. LEONARD W. HALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield.

Mr. LEONARD W. HALL. The situations to which the gentleman refers are not comparable at all to this. You are asking for an extension of this rate without city limits. This bill applies to a county within a city. If you pass the amendment which you have offered, you will have towns and villages and counties outside of a city receiving the 2-cent postal rate the same as in the city. We do not ask for that. We simply want the 2-cent postal rate within the county of Queens, which is wholly within New York City.

Mr. CHURCH. I understand that the Borough of Queens, N. Y., is entirely within the city of New York.

Mr. LEONARD W. HALL. That is right.

Mr. CHURCH. And that this bill as drawn with this proviso in it will take care of your situation.

Mr. LEONARD W. HALL. That is right.

Mr. CHURCH. But the territories in Cook County and in these other counties I have mentioned, with their outlying towns, are just as compact as the territory in towns in your county. The gentleman understands I am not objecting to the bill. I told him I did not. But there are persons who are interested. I told the gentleman I would not object. There are, however, three objectors here, which will strike your bill from the Consent Calendar, and there is a great deal of merit in this bill as amended, and I believe the gentleman should accept the amendment, and you will have legislation that will give you the benefit of the 2-cent rate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield.

Mr. RICH. Is it not a fact that the Post Office Department is going in the red from eighty to one hundred million dollars a year? This administration gave you the 3-cent postage and some of these towns are sick and tired of it and want to get rid of the 3-cent postage. You will never get rid of the 3-cent postage and keep the Post Office Department operating without a deficit.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania know that in my own home district, where this matter is a problem, it is costing a lot more money to send the postmen out with mail that cannot be delivered because it does not have the 3-cent stamp, then back to the main office, then a letter or two to the person who dispatched the letter, and before you get through you spend a lot more time and money than you would save by not agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield to the gentleman, a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. I realize he is probably in favor of this bill.

Mr. MASON. The Post Office Committee went on record unanimously three times for this bill. If you complicate it by bringing in the county that is not within a city district, then you are going to ruin the bill, it seems to me. It is a different situation entirely.

Mr. CHURCH. I understand the Congress has passed this bill three times the way I am amending it.

Mr. MASON. Oh, no, no. It was vetoed the last time.

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MOSER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. One objection is heard, not a sufficient number.

There being no further objection; the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the proviso in section 1001 of the Revenue Act of 1932 (relating to postal rates) is amended to read as follows: "Provided, That such additional rate shall not apply to first-class matter mailed for local delivery or for delivery wholly within a county the popuation of which exceeds 1,000,000, provided said county is entirely within a corporate city."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DESIGNATING THE PERSON TO ACT AS PRESIDENT UNDER CERTAIN CIRCUMSTANCES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9462, designating the person who shall act as President if a President shall not have been chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, or when neither a President-elect nor a Vice President-elect shall have qualified.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice. Because of the importance of this measure it ought to have more discussion than the unanimous Consent Calendar proceedings permit.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

UTE INDIANS

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 72, to amend the act entitled "An act conferring jurisdiction upon the United States Court of Claims to hear, examine, adjudicate, and render judgment on any and all claims which the Ute Indians or any tribe or band thereof may have against the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 28, 1938.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED INDIANS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5944, to carry out certain obligations to certain enrolled Indians under tribal agreement.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I withhold my objection to permit the gentleman to make a statement.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that we may not have another opportunity to consider this bill, I shall endeavor to clear up any objection that might be expressed to its passage.

This bill merely provides that Indians who have paid taxes they should not have paid may have a chance to file for a refund. You will notice from the letter of the Secretary of the Interior that he makes the following statement:

Many Indians who have received allotments of land pursuant to tribal treaties or agreements with the United States were guaranteed exemption from taxation as to their allotments by the terms of the treaties or agreements.

It has been held that such exemption is a vested contractual property right which cannot legally be set aside and denied the Indians under the fifth amendment to the Constitution.

These Indians have paid these taxes. This bill is merely to give them a chance to seek recovery of the tax that is all. Certainly the gentleman would not object to that kind of procedure.

Mr. CHURCH. In answer to the gentleman's suggestion that there may not be much more time within which to consider this bill, let me say that I do not agree with him. I think the House will be in session for some time to come. Secondly, this bill established a precedent, and that is the reason for my request.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, certainly this bill does not establish a precedent, because the right of Indians to apply for a refund of taxes illegally collected is a precedent that has been established in all cases where the courts have invalidated taxes.

Mr. CHURCH. Let me say to the gentleman from South Dakota that the Treasury Department does feel that this would establish a precedent, in that every claim now barred by the statute of limitations would be opened up under the provisions of this bill. It is estimated there are from 1,000 to 1,500 cases.

I contend that a bill of this character should receive further discussion than can be given it on the call of the Consent Calendar.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The Congress has many times passed legislation extending the time under which people were entitled to apply for refund of taxes.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Regardless of what the cost might be if the taxes were collected illegally should not the claimants recover?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request that this bill be passed over without prejudice?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COLE of New York and Mr. COSTELLO objected.

AUTHORIZING PARTICIPATION OF STATES IN CERTAIN REVENUES FROM NATIONAL PARKS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9535, to authorize the participation of States in certain revenues from national parks, national monuments, and other areas under the administrative jurisdiction of the National Park Service, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WARREN). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

TOLL BRIDGE ACROSS THE STRAITS OF MACKINAC NEAR ST. IGNACE, MICH.

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1379, granting the consent of Congress to the Mackinac Straits Bridge Authority to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge or series of bridges, causeways, and approaches thereto, across the Straits of Mackinac at or near a point between St. Ignace, Mich., and the lower peninsula of Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO]?

There was no objection.

BRIDGE OVER MISSISSIPPI RIVER AT OR NEAR KEOKUK, IOWA

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5382, authorizing the city of Keokuk, Iowa, to purchase, construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Keokuk, Iowa.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to promote interstate commerce, improve the postal service, and provide for military and other purposes, the city of Keokuk, Iowa, or its assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Mississippi River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Keokuk, Iowa, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act. For like purposes, the city of Keokuk, Iowa, or its assigns, is hereby authorized to purchase, maintain, and operate the existing bridge for vehicular traffic crossing the Mississippi River at or near the city of Keokuk, Iowa, and said bridge after purchase shall be operated and maintained pursuant to the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. There is hereby conferred upon the city of Keokuk, Iowa, all such rights and powers to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property needed for the purchase, location, construction, maintenance, and operation of any such bridge and its approaches as are possessed by railroad corporations for railroad purposes or by bridge corporations for bridge purposes in the State in which such real estate or other property is situated, upon making just compensation therefor, to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of such State, and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation or expropriation of property for public purposes in such State.

SEC. 3. The said city of Keokuk, Iowa, is hereby authorized to fix and charge tolls for transit over such bridge, and the rates of toll so fixed shall be the legal rates until changed by the Secretary of War under the authority contained in the act of March 23, 1906.

SEC. 4. In fixing the rates of toll to be charged for the use of such bridge the same shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the cost of such bridge and its approaches, including reasonable interest and financing cost, as soon as possible, under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 20 years from the completion thereof. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls. An accurate record of the cost of the bridge and its approaches, the expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 5. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, after line 12, strike out all of section 2 and change section numbers 3, 4, and 5 to 2, 3, and 4.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LIABILITY OF UNITED STATES FOR MASSACRE OF SIOUX INDIAN MEN, WOMEN, AND CHILDREN

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 953, to liquidate the liability of the United States for the massacre of Sioux Indian men, women, and children at Wounded Knee on December 29, 1890.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN]?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the present consideration of the bill.

CONSTRUCTION AT MILITARY POSTS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9896, to authorize appropriations for construction at military posts, and for other purposes.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH]?

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I say to the gentleman that this is a War Department request for the privilege of purchasing additional land that is badly needed in connection with the national-defense program.

Mr. CHURCH. May I say to the gentleman that this bill authorizes an appropriation for construction at military posts, and so forth. The amount involved is something like $15,000,000 to be expended for the construction, rehabilitation, and so forth, of these posts. The gentleman is familiar with the statement made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT], who is not on the floor at the present time, that in matters of this kind where so much money is involved it is a sort of unwritten policy with our Consent Calendar committee that these bills should be debated, or at least have the discussion that we cannot have here. That is the reason for my request. It is to uphold the gentleman from Michigan on our side, who has done valuable service. I would not be fair to him if I did not insist on my position.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH]?

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I am therefore obliged to object to the consideration of the bill at this time.

ACQUISITION OF ADDITIONAL LAND FOR MILITARY PURPOSES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9897, to authorize the acquisition of additional land for military purposes.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice, and supplementing my statement on the last bill, may I say that I do not feel that the present war hysteria should control to the extent that we should pass these bills by unanimous consent and without discussion. I favor quick preparation for defense, but certainly these large amounts, $3,500,000 involved in this bill and $15,000,000 involved in the other one, certainly should require fuller discussion on the floor of the House than the proceedings under the Consent Calendar afford.

Mr. MAY. May I say to the gentleman that our committee has given extensive time and had elaborate hearings on all of these matters. We have found upon testimony given by the War Department and without objection from the Bureau of the Budget that every one of these tracts of land is essential to the necessary expansion of the national defense program. We have gone into details. If the gentleman will give a reasonable excuse, or if he will read the report of the committee, he will find it is an absolute necessity at this time and should not be delayed.

Mr. CHURCH. May I state to the gentleman, who has given much study to these bills, that I will probably vote with him on this bill, but this unanimous Consent Calendar committee has worked day in and day out on these measures and we have read these bills. We are familiar with them. I have spent many hours of my time for the last 4 days familiarizing myself with these bills. If the gentleman's remarks mean that I have not read and studied every word of this bill, and the report they are a little bit exaggerated.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I meant no such thing, and I said nothing that even intimated that. I stated that our committee had studied this matter very carefully and it believes that they are essential items in the necessary expansion of the program for national defense, for which the gentleman has already voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH]?

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I am obliged to object.

AMENDMENT TO SECTION 113 OF THE CRIMINAL CODE

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9024, relating to the status of retired officers of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard of the United States, and to amend section 113 of the Criminal Code.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 113 of the Criminal Code is hereby amended by inserting at the end thereof the following:

"Retired officers of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard of the United States, while not on active duty, shall not by reason of their status as such be subject to the provisions of this section."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 8, change the period to a colon and insert "Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to allow any retired officer to represent any person in the sale of anything to the Government through the department in whose service he holds a retired status."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ORLEANS LEVEE DISTRICT, NEW ORLEANS, LA.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9927, declaring a forfeiture of certain land heretofore granted by the United States to the board of commissioners of the Orleans Levee District, in the city of New Orleans, State of Louisiana, for levee and street purposes.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby forfeited to and revested in the United States of America title to that certain strip of land situated in the city of New Orleans, parish of Orleans, State of Louisiana, measuring two hundred and ten and two one-hundredths feet in length and seven and thirty-seven one-hundredths feet in width, more particularly described in the resolution adopted February 23, 1940, by the board of commissioners of the Orleans Levee District, and being part of the land granted by the act of Congress approved April 22, 1932 (47 Stat. 133, ch. 127), to the board of commissioners of the Orleans Levee District of New Orleans, La. The control and custody of the land hereby forfeited is revested in the Attorney General.

SEC. 2. The grant by the aforesaid act of Congress approved April 22, 1932, and the restrictions and conditions imposed therein shall remain in full force and effect as to that portion of the land the title to which is not declared forfeited by this act and the Attorney General is hereby authorized to execute and deliver to the board of commissioners of the Orleans Levee District a proper quitclaim deed of that portion of the land not forfeited.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ALASKA RAILROAD RETIREMENT

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8046, to amend section 1 of the act entitled "An act for the retirement of employees of the Alaska Railroad, Territory of Alaska, who are citizens of the United States," approved June 29, 1936.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act entitled "An act for the retirement of employees of the Alaska Railroad, Territory of Alaska, who are citizens of the United States," approved June 29, 1936 (49 Stat. 2017), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"That all employees of the Alaska Railroad, Territory of Alaska, who are citizens of the United States and whose tenure of employment is not intermittent nor of uncertain duration, shall come within the provisions of this act: Provided, however, That employees of the Alaska Railroad who in the past have been, or in the future may be, employed thereon for the period of at least 3 months per year for at least 2 years shall come within the provisions of this act."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 8, after "act", insert the following: "Provided further, That clerical employees of the Alaska Railroad who were subject to the Civil Service Retirement Act of May 22, 1920, as amended, at any time between July 1, 1935, and the effective date of this act shall deposit in the Alaska Railroad retirement and disability fund an additional 1½ percent of the basic salary, pay, or compensation received by them during such period, together with interest computed at the rate of 4 percent per annum compounded on the last day of each fiscal year, but such interest shall not be included for any period during which the employee was separated from the service.

"SEC. 2. The United States Civil Service Commission is hereby authorized and directed to ascertain the amount, if any, including accrued interest, due employees of the Alaska Railroad coming within the purview of this act from the civil-service retirement and disability funds created by the act of May 22, 1920, and to certify same to the Secretary of the Treasury, who is hereby authorized and directed to transfer such amount on the books of the Treasury Department to the Alaska Railroad retirement and disability fund.

"SEC. 3. This act shall take effect on the first day of the third month next following its approval."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SMITHSONIAN GALLERY OF ART COMMISSION

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9806, to permit the Smithsonian Gallery of Art Commission to purchase a model of the winning design for the proposed Smithsonian Gallery of Art, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CHURCH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the chairman of the committee if he will be kind enough to explain this bill and call attention especially to the reappropriation feature? The gentleman's committee is reappropriating money in this bill.

Mr. KELLER. That is right. There is no new appropriation. The resolution, passed about a year ago, has been carried out by the Commission appointed as a result of the passage of that resolution, and the money has been spent or contracted to be spent, except for $1,000, which is left in the Treasury. This is merely to carry out the contract entered into, which did not get past the Accounting Office until too late at the end of the year.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, the bill carries an appropriation of funds without respect to the rules of the House. Under those circumstances, I believe the gentleman from Illinois should ask that the bill be stricken from the calendar.

Mr. CHURCH. Let me read section 2 for the benefit of the gentleman:

SEC. 2. There is hereby reappropriated, out of the unexpended balance of the amount appropriated in the Second Deficiency Appropriation Act, approved June 25, 1938, under the heading "Independent establishments," subheading "Smithsonian Institution," the sum of $2,500 to carry out the provisions of subsection (a) of section 1; and the sum of $1,500 is hereby made immediately available out of such unexpended balance to carry out the provisions of subsection (b) of section 1.

May I say to the gentleman that it occurs to me that the House is not in the habit of passing measures appropriating money or reappropriating money when those measures come from committees other than the Committee on Appropriations, except under exceptional situations where the House is willing to waive the point of order.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. KELLER. I hope the gentleman will withhold his request.

Mr. TABER. I cannot.

Mr. KELLER. Then I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TABER. I object, Mr. Speaker.

RETIREMENT BENEFITS FOR CERTAIN INTERPRETERS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8181, to grant retirement benefits to Chinese, Japanese, and Hindu interpreters in the United States Immigration and Naturalization Service.

Mr. MOSER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his request?

Mr. MOSER. I withhold it; certainly.

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Speaker, this bill applies to a very small group of interpreters of the Chinese, Japanese, and Hindu languages—only about 20 or 25 in all—who have been in the Government service in regular employment for over 10 years. There is a recommendation from both the Civil Service Commission and the Department of Labor that they be granted the right of retirement benefits. The bill applies only to American citizens. I hope the gentleman will withhold his request.

Mr. MOSER. Mr. Speaker, I insist on my request that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8645, to provide Saturday half holidays for char force working in Post Office Department.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of March 3, 1931, entitled "An act providing for Saturday half holidays for certain Government employees" (46 Stat. 1482; 5 U. S. C. 26a), is amended by inserting after the words "Postal Service" and the comma thereafter the following, to be followed by a comma: "excepting that this act shall apply to charmen and charwomen, head charmen and head charwomen working in the custodial service of the Post Office Department, under the supervision of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General,".

SEC. 2. This act shall take effect immediately upon its passage.

AMENDMENT OF THE NATIONAL DEFENSE ACT

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9898, to further amend section 13a of the National Defense Act so as to authorize officers detailed for training and duty as aircraft observers to be so rated, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first proviso of section 13a of the National Defense Act as amended by section 2 of the act of July 2, 1926 (44 Stat. 781), is hereby amended by striking out the words "Provided, That the Chief of the Air Corps, at least two brigadier generals, and at least 90 percent of the officers in each grade below that of brigadier general shall be flying officers", and by substituting in lieu thereof the following: "Provided, That the Chief of the Air Corps, three brigadier generals, and at least 90 percent of the officers in each grade below that of brigadier general shall be officers who have qualified as pilots of service types of aircraft."

SEC. 2. The fourth and fifth provisos of section 13a of the National Defense Act as amended by section 2 of the act of July 2, 1926 (44 Stat. 781), and the sixth proviso of said act as amended by section 2 of the act of July 2, 1926 (44 Stat. 781), and section 3 of the act of June 16, 1936 (49 Stat. 1524), including the two provisos added by the act last-mentioned, are further amended to read as follows: "Provided further, That in order to insure that the commissioned officers of the Air Corps shall be properly qualified flying officers and, for the purpose of giving officers of the Army an opportunity so to qualify, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to detail officers to the Air Corps for training as flying officers, and such officers shall start flying training immediately upon being so detailed: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to limit the number of officers who may be detailed to the Air Corps for training as flying officers: Provided further, That the limitation on the number of officers of the several branches of the Army who may be required by competent authority to participate regularly and frequently in aerial flights imposed by section 20 of the act of June 10, 1922 (42 Stat. 632), as amended by section 6 of the act of July 2, 1926 (44 Stat. 782), shall not apply to officers of the several branches of the Army detailed to the Air Corps for training and duty as aircraft observers or as other members of combat crews: Provided further, That flying units shall in all cases be commanded by flying officers who have received aeronautical ratings as pilots of service types of aircraft and who are commissioned in the Air Corps, or qualified permanent general officers of the line who have received aeronautical ratings as pilots of service types of aircraft: Provided further, That a flying officer is defined as one who has received an aeronautical rating as a pilot of service types of aircraft or one who has received an aeronautical rating as an aircraft observer or as any other member of a combat crew under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe."

SEC. 3. Such laws and parts of laws as may be inconsistent with the foregoing are hereby repealed.

With the following committee amendments:

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COOPERATION WITH SCHOOL BOARD, WALKER, MINN.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6583, for expenditure of funds for cooperation with the public-school board at Walker, Minn., for the construction, extension, equipment, and improvement of public-school facilities to be available to all Indian children in the district.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $65,000 for the purpose of cooperating with the public-school board, town of Walker, county of Cass, Minn., for the construction, extension, equipment, and improvement of the public-school facilities at Walker, Minn.: Provided, That the expenditure of any money so authorized shall be subject to the express conditions that the school maintained by the said district in the said building shall be available to all Indian children of the district, on the same terms, except as to payment of tuition, as other children of said school district: Provided further, That plans and specifications for construction, extension, or improvement of structures shall be furnished by local or State authorities without cost to the United States, and upon approval thereof by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs actual work shall proceed under the direction of such local or State officials. Payment for work in place shall be made monthly on vouchers properly certified by local officials of the Indian Service: Provided further, That funds thus appropriated may be used as sponsors' contribution for the construction, extension, equipment, and improvement of the public-school facilities at Walker, Minn., approved and carried on under funds of the Works Progress Administration.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $65,000 for the purpose of cooperating with the public-school board, Cass County, Minn., for the construction, extension, equipment, and improvement of the public-school facilities at a location to be agreed upon by the Secretary of the Interior and the school officials of Cass County, Minn.: Provided, That the expenditure of any money so authorized shall be subject to the express conditions that the school maintained by the said district in the said building shall be available to all Indian children of the district, on the same terms, except as to payment of tuition, as other children of said school district: Provided further, That plans and specifications for construction, extension, or improvement of structures shall be furnished by local or State authorities without cost to the United States, and upon approval thereof by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs actual work shall proceed under the direction of such local or State officials. Payment for work in place shall be made monthly on vouchers properly certified by local officials of the Indian Service: Provided further, That funds thus appropriated may be used as sponsors' contribution for the construction, extension, equipment, and improvement of the said public-school facilities approved and carried on under funds of the Work Projects Administration: And provided further, That any amount expended on any project hereunder shall be recouped by the United States within a period of 30 years, commencing with the date of occupancy of the project, through reducing the annual Federal payments for the education of Indian pupils enrolled in public or high schools of the district involved, or by the acceptance of Indian pupils in such schools without cost to the United States, and in computing the amount of recoupment for each project interest at 3 percent per annum shall be included on unrecouped balances."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for expenditure of funds for cooperation with the public-school board, Cass County, Minn., for the construction, extension, equipment, and improvement of public-school facilities to be available to Indian children in the district."

CIVIL SERVICE FOR ASSISTANT OR DEPUTY COMMISSIONERS OF THE GENERAL LAND OFFICE AND BUREAU OF INDIAN AFFAIRS IN THE DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9041, to provide that assistant or deputy heads of certain bureaus in the Department of the Interior shall be appointed under the civil-service laws, and for other purposes.

Mr. MOSER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

AMENDING OF CIVIL SERVICE RETIREMENT ACT AND OTHER RETIREMENT ACTS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8621, amending civil-service retirement acts and other retirement acts.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of amendments to this bill.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, the question of objection was not put.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair certainly was of the opinion that the question had been put. However, if there is any doubt about it——

Mr. TABER. No, Mr. Speaker; I was listening for it.

Mr. RAMSPECK. If the gentleman will yield to me, I would like to ask the gentleman what his objection is to the bill.

Mr. TABER. I wanted the gentleman to explain it before I let it go by.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The bill was introduced by reason of request of General Hines, of the Veterans' Administration, for the purpose of clearing up a disagreement as to the time allowed veterans for service in the armed forces of the United States in determining length of service with the Federal Government.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks in view of the record that he should again put the question. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first paragraph of section 5 of the Civil Service Retirement Act of May 29, 1930 (46 Stat. 472; 5 U. S. C. 707), be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. Subject to the provisions of section 9 hereof, the aggregate period of service which forms the basis for calculating the amount of any benefit provided in this act shall be computed from the date of original employment, whether as a classified or an unclassified employee in the civil service of the United States, or in the service of the District of Columbia, including periods of service at different times and in one or more departments, branches, or independent offices, or the legislative branch of the Government, and also periods of service performed overseas under authority of the United States, and periods of honorable service in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard of the United States; in the case of an employee, however, who is eligible for and receives retired pay on account of military or naval service, the period of service upon which such retired pay is based shall not be included; in the case of an employee who is eligible for and receives a pension on account of non-service-connected disability under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration the minimum period of service necessary to entitle him to pension shall not be included; but in the case of an employee who is eligible for and receives pension or compensation under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration on account of service-connected disability, all honorable military or naval service shall be included; and nothing in this act shall be construed as to affect in any manner an employee's right to retired pay, pension, or compensation in addition to the annuity herein provided."

SEC. 2. That the first paragraph of section 7 of the act entitled "An act for the retirement of employees of the Panama Canal and the Panama Railroad Co., on the Isthmus of Panama, who are citizens of the United States," approved March 2, 1931 (46 Stat. 1476; 48 U. S. C. 1371f), be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 7. Subject to the provisions of section 8 hereof, the service which shall form the basis for calculating the amount of any benefit provided in this act shall be computed from the date of original employment, whether as a classified or an unclassified employee, in the civil service of the United States, or under the municipal government of the District of Columbia, including periods of service at different times and in one or more departments, branches, or independent offices of the Government, and service on the Isthmus of Panama with the Isthmian Canal Commission, the Panama Canal, or the Panama Railroad Co.; also periods of service performed overseas and under authority of the United States and periods of honorable service in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard of the United States. In the case of an employee, however, who is eligible for and receives retired pay on account of military or naval service, the period of service upon which such retired pay is based shall not be included; in the case of an employee who is eligible for and receives a pension on account of non-service-connected disability under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration the minimum period of service necessary to entitle him to pension shall not be included; but in the case of an employee who is eligible for and receives pension or compensation under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration on account of service-connected disability, all honorable military or naval service shall be included; and nothing in this act shall be construed as to affect in any manner an employee's right to retired pay, pension, or compensation in addition to the annuity herein provided."

SEC. 3. That the first paragraph of section 7 of the act entitled "An act for the retirement of employees of the Alaska Railroad, Territory of Alaska, who are citizens of the United States," approved June 29, 1936 (49 Stat. 2021; 5 U. S. C. 745f), as amended by the act approved August 7, 1939 (Public Law No. 320, 76th Cong.), be further amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 7. Subject to the provisions of section 8 hereof, the service which shall form the basis for calculating the amount of any benefit provided in this act shall be computed from the date of original employment, whether as a classified or an unclassified employee in the civil service of the United States or under the municipal government of the District of Columbia, including periods of service at different times and in one or more departments, branches, or independent offices of the Government and service in Alaska with the Alaskan Engineering Commission and the Alaska Railroad, or of either of them, and service on the Isthmus of Panama with the Isthmian Canal Commission, the Panama Canal, or the Panama Railroad Co.; also periods of service performed overseas under authority of the United States and periods of honorable service in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard of the United States. In the case of an employee, however, who is eligible for and receives retired pay on account of military or naval service, the period of service upon which such retired pay is based shall not be included; in the case of an employee who is eligible for and receives a pension on account of non-service-connected disability under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration the minimum period of service necessary to entitle him to pension shall not be included; but in the case of an employee who is eligible for and receives pension or compensation under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration on account of service-connected disability, all honorable military or naval service shall be included; and nothing in this act shall be construed as to affect in any manner an employee's right to retired pay, pension, or compensation in addition to the annuity herein provided."

SEC. 4. That the last clause of paragraph (o) of section 26 of the act entitled "An act for the grading and classification of clerks in the Foreign Service of the United States of America, and providing compensation therefor," approved February 23, 1931 (46 Stat. 1213; 22 U. S. C. 21), as amended by the act of August 5, 1939 (Public Law No. 277, 76th Cong.), be further amended to read as follows: "but in the case of a Foreign Service officer who is eligible for and receives retired pay on account of military or naval service, the period of service upon which such retired pay is based shall not be included; in the case of an employee who is eligible for and receives a pension on account of non-service-connected disability under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration the minimum period of service necessary to entitle him to pension shall not be included; but in the case of an employee who is eligible for and receives pension or compensation under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration on account of service-connected disability, all honorable military or naval service shall be included; and nothing in this act shall be construed as to affect in any manner an employee's right to retired pay, pension, or compensation in addition to the annuity herein provided."

SEC. 5. This act shall take effect the 1st day of the month next succeeding the date of enactment. Any person separated from the service prior to such effective date may, upon request, have his claim for retirement adjudicated under the terms of this act; but no increase in annuity shall be allowed prior to such effective date nor shall this act be construed so as to reduce the annuity of any person separated prior to its effective date.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendments, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAMSPECK: Page 2, line 24, strike out all of lines 24 and 25, and on page 3, strike out lines 1 to 4, inclusive, and insert:

"SEC. 2. That the first paragraph of section 97 of title II, Canal Zone Code, be amended to read as follows:

" 'SEC. 97. The computation of accredited service, subject to the provisions of section 98 of this title.' "

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the other committee amendments offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAMSPECK: Page 3, line 7, after the word "this", strike out the word "act" and insert the word "article."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAMSPECK: Page 4, line 6, after the word "this" strike out the word "act" and insert the word "article."

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

AMENDMENT TO BANKRUPTCY ACT

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 9864), amending the Bankruptcy Act with respect to the basis of property and excluding certain corporations from the provisions of chapter XI.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That effective as of June 22, 1938, section 270 of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved July 1, 1898, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 270. In determining the basis of property for any purposes of any law of the United States or of a State imposing a tax upon income, the basis of the debtor's property (other than money) or of such property (other than money) as is transferred to any person required to use the debtor's basis in whole or in part shall be decreased by an amount equal to the amount by which the indebtedness of the debtor, not including accrued interest unpaid and not resulting in a tax benefit on any income tax return, has been canceled or reduced in a proceeding under this chapter, but the basis of any particular property shall not be decreased to an amount less than the fair market value of such property as of the date as of which the plan became effective. Any determination of value in a proceeding under this chapter shall not be deemed a determination of fair market value for the purposes of this section. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe such regulations as he may deem necessary in order to reflect such decrease in basis for Federal income-tax purposes and otherwise carry into effect the purposes of this section."

SEC. 2. Effective as of June 22, 1938, section 396 of such act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 396. In determining the basis of property for any purposes of any law of the United States or of a State imposing a tax upon income, the basis of the debtor's property (other than money) or of such property (other than money) as is transferred to any person required to use the debtor's basis in whole or in part shall be decreased by an amount equal to the amount by which the indebtedness of the debtor, not including accrued interest unpaid and not resulting in a tax benefit on any income-tax return, has been canceled or reduced in a proceeding under this chapter, but the basis of any particular property shall not be decreased to an amount less than the fair market value of such property as of the date as of which the plan became effective. Any determination of value in a proceeding under this chapter shall not be deemed a determination of fair market value for the purposes of this section. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe such regulations as he may deem necessary in order to reflect such decrease in basis for Federal income-tax purposes and otherwise carry into effect the purposes of this section."

SEC. 3. Effective as of June 22, 1938, section 522 of such act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 522. In determining the basis of property for any purposes of any law of the United States or of a State imposing a tax upon income, the basis of the debtor's property (other than money) or of such property (other than money) as is transferred to any person required to use the debtor's basis in whole or in part shall be decreased by an amount equal to the amount by which the indebtedness of the debtor, not including accrued interest unpaid and not resulting in a tax benefit on any income-tax return, has been canceled or reduced in a proceeding under this chapter, but the basis of any particular property shall not be decreased to an amount less than the fair market value of such property as of the date as of which the plan became effective. Any determination of value in a proceeding under this chapter shall not be deemed a determination of fair market value for the purposes of this section. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe such regulations as he may deem necessary in order to reflect such decrease in basis for Federal income-tax purposes and otherwise carry into effect the purposes of this section."

SEC. 4. Section 306 of such act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 306. For the purposes of this chapter, unless inconsistent with the context—

"(1) 'arrangement' shall mean any plan of a debtor for the settlement, satisfaction, or extension of the time of payment of his unsecured debts, upon any terms;

"(2) 'consideration' shall include evidences of indebtedness, either secured or unsecured, stock and certificates of beneficial interest therein, and certificates of beneficial interest in property;

"(3) 'debtor' shall mean a person who could become a bankrupt under section 4 of this act and who files a petition under this chapter, except that such term shall not include a corporation if any class of securities of such corporation is owned by 100 or more persons. For the purposes of this paragraph, 'securities of such corporation' shall include (a) unsecured claims against such corporation represented by notes, bonds, debentures, or evidences of indebtedness, and certificates of interest or participation in any such claims;

(b) guaranties by such corporation of claims, whether secured or unsecured, against any other person or its property, represented by notes, bonds, debentures, or evidences of indebtedness, or of certificates of interest or participation in any such claims; and (c) stock, shares, and similar interests in such corporation, certificates and other evidences of such stock, shares, or interests, and voting trust certificates for such stock, shares, or interests;

"(4) 'executory contracts' shall include unexpired leases of real property; and

"(5) 'petition' shall mean a petition filed under this chapter by a debtor proposing an arrangement."

SEC. 5. Section 323 of such act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 323. A petition filed under this chapter shall state that the debtor is insolvent or unable to pay his debts as they mature and the facts showing that the petitioner is a 'debtor' as defined in section 306, and shall set forth the provisions of the arrangement proposed by him."

SEC. 6. Chapter XI of such act, as amended, is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 328. Upon the filing of a petition by a debtor, the judge shall enter an order approving the petition, if satisfied that it complies with the requirements of this chapter and has been filed in good faith, or dismissing it if not so satisfied."

SEC. 7. The amendments made by sections 4, 5, and 6 shall not apply with respect to proceedings in which, before the date of the enactment of this act, (a) the petition was filed under such chapter XI, or (b) the petition was amended under section 147 of such act.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 9, strike out "the date as of which the plan became effective" and insert "the date of entry of the order confirming the plan."

Page 3, line 7, strike out "the date as of which the plan became effective" and insert "the date of entry of the order confirming the arrangement."

Page 4, line 5, strike out "the date as of which the plan became effective" and insert "the date of entry of the order confirming the arrangement."

Page 4, line 14, to page 6, line 16, strike out sections 4, 5, 6, and 7.

The committee amendments were agreed to, and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The title was amended to read as follows: "A bill amending the Bankruptcy Act with respect to the basis of property."

MOUNTAIN JUDICIAL DISTRICT, STATE OF TENNESSEE

The Clerk called the bill (S. 1681) to amend section 107 of the Judicial Code to create a mountain district in the State of Tennessee, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DISPOSAL OF UNITED STATES CUSTOMHOUSE, DETROIT

The Clerk called House Joint Resolution 472, to prohibit the sale or disposal of the United States customhouse for the city of Detroit.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Whereas the United States customhouse, located at the northwest corner of Larned and Griswold Streets in the city of Detroit, is at the present time on the list of Federal surplus real estate to be disposed of by sale; and

Whereas the aforementioned customhouse is situated conveniently close to the Detroit River front, which location has been proven to be the most advantageous due to the nature of customs service work; and

Whereas the Federal Government is now renting privately owned space in the city of Detroit at a cost in excess of $215,000 per annum to house Federal offices; and

Whereas the present Detroit customhouse has an annual maintenance cost of only $19,000: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That until otherwise expressly permitted by Congress the United States customhouse for the city of Detroit, administered by the Public Buildings Administration of the Federal Works Agency, shall not be sold or disposed of.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, in the first "Whereas", following the word "Detroit", strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Page 1, in the second "Whereas", strike out the words "Whereas the aforementioned customhouse."

Page 1, in the third "Whereas", after the word "cost", strike out "in excess of $215,000" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "of $172,742.80."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

ACCEPTING JURISDICTION OVER OLYMPIC NATIONAL PARK

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 6559) to accept the cession by the State of Washington of exclusive jurisdiction over the lands embraced within the Olympic National Park, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object in order to ask my colleague from the State of Washington [Mr. HILL] a few questions. As I understand it, the purpose of this proposed legislation is to permit compliance by the Federal Government with the act of the Legislature of the State of Washington of March 16, 1939. That act provides that the State of Washington cede to the United States jurisdiction over certain territory that is now or may hereafter be included within the Olympic National Park. The park was established by act of Congress of June 29, 1938, after 3 years consideration and very complete committee hearings. The State law expressly provides that the cession of jurisdiction by the State shall not be effective until the Federal Government notifies the Governor of the State that the United States assumes police or military jurisdiction over the lands in question. This legislation, as I understand it, is intended to give this required notice, and is in compliance with the statute enacted by the Legislature of the State of Washington, which I have referred to. However, the legislation, I note, calls for certain amendments in regard to fishing privileges and rights-of-way and it is particularly these that I want to have clarified.

The amendments relating to the fishing are intended to permit the continuance of commercial fishing within the park area. Is that correct?

Mr. HILL. That is true.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. The act of Congress of June 29, 1938, expressly provides that there shall be joint consultation by the President with the Governor of the State of Washington for at least 8 months and until the final boundaries are decided upon, and these negotiations were carried on to the beginning of this year. Certain important amendments are proposed, to grant rights-of-way over and across lands along the Queets River west of the Olympic National Park and along the coast. The proposed amendment sets forth certain legal descriptions to which these rights-of-way are to apply for the movement of minerals, timber, and other products, and for the use of logging railroads and public utilities. Can the gentleman inform me whether the Governor of the State of Washington has been consulted and whether the legal descriptions contained in these amendments are satisfactory to the Governor of the State of Washington, and were agreed upon during his negotiations and consultations with the President as provided in the act of Congress?

He wrote that proviso into the act, an unusual proviso, so that all these matters could be thoroughly considered and thrashed out betwen the Federal and the State Governments, and 2 years have gone by since the act was passed with that requirement, so there has been ample time and opportunity to go into the whole proposition thoroughly. Has this been done? Have the communities and interested parties presented, through the Governor, their case?

Mr. HILL. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. WALLGREN], author of the bill, is here and he can probably answer.

Mr. WALLGREN. They are satisfactory and the legislature has passed this act giving this jurisdiction to the Federal Government.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. I will say to my colleague that that hardly answers my question. I am speaking about the amendments concerning the rights-of-way to that strip that it is proposed to acquire along the Queets River. Of course, that is not a part of the original Park Act nor this legislation for ceding these lands. These amendments are being added under this legislation, giving notice of acceptance by the Federal Government of jurisdiction and it is very important that all the land affected be included so that there will be no question about rights-of-way in that area, so that logging railroads and private citizens and the people in those communities in that vicinity can have ingress and egress over that strip of land, referred to out there as the "Queets Corridor."

Mr. WALLGREN. The act as passed by the legislature takes into consideration all the land that might be added to the park. That particular strip is added to the park.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. I will say that that is not what I am talking about. I am talking about the rights-of-way to cross those lands, which will be included in the park, for commercial purposes. Although the area is not within my congressional district, being in the gentleman's district, some of my constituents are interested. I have been urging to the National Park Service and the Public Lands Committee that such amendments be included in this legislation. It is quite possible that those interested did not make timely presentation of this matter to the President through the Governor, having been more or less dilatory in regard to this entire park matter, which has been pending for 5 years, since the gentleman introduced his first bill early in 1935. In view of this somnolence, I am trying to ascertain whether the legal descriptions of the lands crossed by the rights-of-way have been verified and approved by the Governor of the State of Washington. My colleagues apparently do not know whether this has been done or not. This, it seems to me, is important. The lands are described as being within township 24 north, range 10 west, township 25 north, range 10 west, township 24 north, range 10½ west, township 24 north, range 11 west, township 24 north, range 12 west, and township 24 north, range 13 west, sections 25 to 27, inclusive, Willamette meridian.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Is there objection?

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman whether he is aware of the fact that this narrow strip of land up and down the Queets River to the ocean is about 20 miles in length and runs all the way from a quarter of a mile to 3 miles wide, and that it extends up the coast for about 40 miles and extends at least a half mile out into the ocean so as to encompass two potential submerged oil fields; and that by the extension of the park in the manner in which it has been extended absolutely cuts off any up and down free traffic on that part of the coast. The park extends from the high mountains out into the ocean, so that one must pass through the park in order to travel north and south. I understand, under the provisions of this bill, they are to grant certain concessions as to roads. Without the granting of those concessions there would be no ingress or egress to the country lying between the ocean and the mountains.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HORTON. I yield.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under the circumstances, I am constrained to ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

SALE OF INDIAN FORESTRY PRODUCTS

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 2983, to authorize the sale of lumber and other forest products obtained from the forests on Indian reservations by Indian enterprises.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the lumber and other forest products produced by Indian enterprises from the forests on Indian reservations may be sold under such regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe without compliance with section 3709 of the Revised Statutes.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read a third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PAYMENT OF FIRE CLAIMS, CHIPPEWA INDIANS, MINNESOTA

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 3352, to amend the act of August 27, 1935 (49 Stat. 2194), and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DISPOSITION OF TRUST OR RESTRICTED ESTATES OF INDIANS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9887, to provide for the disposition of trust or restricted estates of Indians dying intestate without heirs.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior may investigate the allotment in the name of any deceased Indian. Upon final determination by the Secretary that the Indian holder of a trust or restricted allotment of lands or an interest therein has died intestate without heirs, the lands or interest so owned, together with all accumulated rents, issues, and profits therefrom held in trust for the decedent, shall escheat to the tribe owning the land at the time of allotment.

If the tribe which owned the land at the time of allotment has been reorganized or reconstituted by reason of amalgamation with another tribe or group of Indians or of subdivision within the tribe or otherwise, the land shall escheat to the tribe or group which has succeeded to the jurisdiction of the original tribe over the area in question. If neither the tribe which owned the land at the time of allotment nor a successor tribe or group exists, the land or interest therein shall be held in trust for such Indians as the Secretary may designate or, if the Secretary determines that the land cannot be appropriately used by or for such Indians, shall be sold, and the proceeds shall be held in trust for such Indians as he may designate.

SEC. 2. If an Indian found to have died intestate without heirs was the holder of a restricted allotment or homestead or interest therein on the public domain, the land or interest and all accumulated rents, issues, and profits therefrom shall escheat to the United States and the land shall become part of the public domain: Provided, That if the Secretary determines that the land involved lies within or adjacent to an Indian community and may be advantageously used for Indian purposes, the land or interest shall escheat to the United States to be held in trust for such Indians as the Secretary of the Interior may designate.

SEC. 3. The proviso in section 12 of an act entitled "An act to provide for determining the heirs of deceased Indians for the disposition and sale of allotments of deceased Indians, for the leasing of allotments, and for other purposes," approved June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. 855, 858), is repealed.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 10, after the word "designate" insert "within the State or States wherein the land is situated."

Page 2, line 14, after the word "designate" insert a comma and "within the State or States wherein the land is situated."

Page 2, line 2, insert "where the value of the estate does not exceed $2,000, and in case of estates exceeding such sum, such estates shall be held in trust by the United States for such Indians as the Congress may hereafter designate."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TORT CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 7236, to provide for the adjustment of certain claims against the United States and to confer jurisdiction in respect thereto on the court of claims and the district courts of the United States, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object for the purpose of asking the gentleman from New York

[Mr. CELLER] a question. As I understand, this bill sets a new precedent. In the report, the Attorney General, Mr. Jackson, states:

The continued immunity of the Government to suit on common-law torts does not seem to be warranted, either as a matter of principle or as a matter of justice.

He states the purpose of the bill is to take care of that. It seems to me this bill is of such importance, establishing a new precedent, that it ought to be considered more than proceedings on this Consent Calendar will permit.

I am going to ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that this bill go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TO COMMEMORATE THE TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE FOUNDING OF THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA

The Clerk called the next business, House Joint Resolution 512, authorizing the recognition of the two hundredth anniversary of the founding of the University of Pennsylvania by Benjamin Franklin and the beginning of university education in the United States, and providing for the representation of the Government and people of the United States in the observance of the anniversary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a similar joint resolution, Senate Joint Resolution 214, may be substituted for the House resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate resolution, as follows:

Whereas there are to be held at Philadelphia, Pa., and at other places during the year 1940 celebrations commemorating the two hundredth anniversary of the founding of the University of Pennsylvania by Benjamin Franklin, said institution being the first university to be established in what are now the United States; and

Whereas in accordance with resolutions of the president and fellows of the University of Pennsylvania, there will take place in Philadelphia, Pa., on the 16th, 17th, 18th, 19th, 20th, and 21st of September 1940 formal ceremonies of celebration of the bicentennial, in the presence of the governing boards, faculties, students, and alumni of the university, the delegates of other institutions, distinguished guests, and a large number of friends and benefactors; and

Whereas the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the city of Philadelphia will be officially represented at the ceremonies; and

Whereas the University of Pennsylvania endeavors to foster and maintain the ideals of truth and freedom so dear to Americans: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the Government and people of the United States unite with the University of Pennsylvania in a fitting and appropriate observance of the two hundredth anniversary of its founding, which marked the formal beginning of university education in the United States (Harvard, William and Mary, and Yale were founded before the University of Pennsylvania, but they were not universities until after the University of Pennsylvania became a university).

SEC. 2. There is hereby established a commission to be known as the United States University of Pennsylvania Bicentennial Commission (hereinafter referred to as the Commission) to be composed of 15 commissioners, as follows: The President of the United States and 4 persons to be appointed by him, the President of the Senate and 4 Members of the Senate to be appointed by said President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives and 4 Members of the House to be appointed by said Speaker.

SEC. 3. The Commission, on behalf of the United States, shall cooperate with the representatives of the University of Pennsylvania, the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and the city of Philadelphia in the appropriate observance of such anniversary and shall extend appropriate courtesies to the delegates of foreign universities and other foreign learned bodies or individuals attending the celebration as guests of the University of Pennsylvania.

SEC. 4. The members of the Commission shall serve without compensation and shall select a chairman from among their number, but the President of the United States shall be designated as the "honorary chairman" of the Commission.

SEC. 5. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000 to be expended by the Commission for expenses, including actual and necessary traveling and subsistence expenses, incurred while discharging its functions under this joint resolution. The Commission shall have power to select, hire, and fix the compensation of such officers and employees as shall be necessary for the performance of its duties without regard to the provisions of other laws applicable to employment or compensation of officers or employees of the United States.

SEC. 6. Any vacancies occurring in the membership of the Commission shall be filled by the President of the United States.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider and a similar House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 512) were laid on the table.

HAYWARD INDIAN SCHOOL

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 2984, authorizing the transfer of title of the Hayward Indian School to the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. GEHRMANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am wondering what the reason is for the gentleman's request. The school is in my district, but it is a liability to the Federal Government because it is not being used for school purposes. It is used as a camp for transients at the present time. The Federal Government has been negotiating to sell it to the State of Wisconsin for years.

A similar bill was passed by the House about a month ago in connection with the Tomah School. That bill was on all fours with the pending bill. The pending bill only authorizes the State of Wisconsin and the Interior Department to enter into negotiations.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I may state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that the report from the Department of the Interior indicates that the school apparently has not been entirely released from use by the Indian Bureau, that the school buildings are being utilized at the present time.

Mr. GEHRMANN. The report is not very clear. The school building is not being used by the Indian Bureau; it is the hospital building that is being used, and that is reserved. The report will show that we reserve the hospital buildings. I would fight against their being released, but that is an entirely separate proposition. There is a tract of land of about 320 acres. The school and the hospital buildings are located on different parts of this tract of land.

Mr. COSTELLO. The gentleman states that the school building is separated from the hospital plant.

Mr. GEHRMANN. Absolutely.

Mr. COSTELLO. How about facilities such as water and light?

Mr. GEHRMANN. So far as electricity is concerned, it is on a high line. Water comes from a well. The well furnishes water for all the buildings. I would absolutely fight against getting rid of the hospital or the nurses' home or the doctors' home. I would insist that those remain there because we need them. But the school building has been closed for years and never will be used for school purposes again.

Mr. COSTELLO. May I ask the gentleman, the author of the report on the bill, whether it is intended to turn over that ground to the State?

Mr. GEHRMANN. I do not know. The Department of the Interior asked me to introduce the bill the first year I was here; that bill provided that it be turned over to the State of Wisconsin, because it is a liability to the Federal Government as it is now. At that time the State did not care to have it, because there was disagreement as to who was to furnish the heat, because the heating plant is a unit.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I hope the gentleman from California will withdraw his request.

I am a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs which favorably reported this bill. At the hearing the Commissioner of Indian Affairs appeared before the committee in favor of this bill. This bill does not transfer one acre of ground, not one board, not one piece of a building. It provides only that the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to transfer to the State of Wisconsin upon such terms and in such manner as may be mutually agreed upon. We have a big plant lying idle. Certainly when taxpayers' funds are invested in great buildings it is not in the interest of economy to have the buildings stand idle and deteriorate.

I hope the gentleman will follow the recommendations of the Secretary of the Interior in favor of this discretionary bill, which was recommended by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and unanimously reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the gentleman has stated the property is no longer utilized in any way for school purposes and is not to be so used in the future, I shall be pleased to withdraw my request that the bill be passed over.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to transfer to the State of Wisconsin, upon such terms and in such manner as may be mutually agreed upon, for institutional or other public use, title to all or any part of the property known and designated as the Hayward Indian School, located at Hayward, Wis.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WAPATO INDIAN IRRIGATION PROJECT

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3402, to authorize the appropriation for payment of the cost of providing additional water for the Wapato Indian irrigation project, Washington.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice. It exceeds $500,000 in amount and is of such consequence that I feel more opportunity should be had for its consideration than can be had on the Consent Calendar.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill does provide for a total appropriation of $800,000—$20,000 annually for 40 years. In fact, when the bill was originally considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs I raised a question about it and asked that a subcommittee be appointed to study the bill. A subcommittee was appointed to hold hearings and study the legislation and report to the full committee. I was a member of that subcommittee. What did we find? We found that these Indians had a valid interest and title to water rights in the Indian reservation. Under a reclamation project the Government of the United States promised those Indians under a solemn, binding treaty, and under an act of Congress enacted August 1, 1914, that it would furnish sufficient water to them in payment of those water rights to adequately irrigate all 40-acre allotments on the Yakima Indian Reservation. It has been found that the Indians have not received sufficient water to do that and this bill provides sufficient water. We have stricken out the $931,500 which the bill, as originally introduced, carried for the Reclamation Bureau to spend. The bill merely executes the contractual obligations of Uncle Sam with his Indian wards. These Indians need that water and they are entitled to it under the treaty and they are entitled to it under the law. I hope the gentleman will not oppose this $20,000 annual expenditure so that Uncle Sam can keep faith with his Indian wards under his treaty obligations and the provisions of existing law.

Mr. CHURCH. Would the gentleman mind telling the House why they have waited 26 years?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Yes. Some of our American Indians have waited 50 years and some will wait 100 years to have their solemn, binding contracts with Uncle Sam carried out. I assure the gentleman that the Indian Commissioner supports this bill which was amended and favorably reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs with a unanimous vote.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, on account of the splendid explanation just made by the gentleman from Wisconsin and because this bill calls for less than a million dollars, I withdraw my request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, sufficient money now estimated in the amount of $1,731,500 to defray the actual cost of furnishing an additional water supply adequate for the irrigation of 40 acres of each allotment on the Yakima Indian Reservation, Wash., in accordance with the act of August 1, 1914 (38 Stat. 604), and an agreement between the Bureau of Reclamation and the Office of Indian Affairs approved by the Secretary of the Interior on September 3, 1936. A sum of money equal in amount to the amount of such cost when determined shall be transferred to the reclamation fund in 40 annual installments to reimburse the Bureau of Reclamation for the proportionate share of the unpaid cost of constructing the necessary storage facilities required to assure the delivery of the necessary quantity of water.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 3, strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $800,000, and credited to the reclamation fund, to defray the actual cost of furnishing an additional quantity of water annually of 100,000 acre-feet which is needed to provide adequate irrigation for 40 acres each of the Indian allotments of the Yakima Reservation as contemplated by the act of August 1, 1914, and as set out in the terms of the agreement between the Bureau of Reclamation and the Office of Indian Affairs approved by the Secretary of the Interior September 3, 1936, the same to be made available in amounts not to exceed $20,000 annually for 40 years."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING LANDS TO BE HELD IN TRUST FOR KLAMATH INDIANS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8922, relating to lands of the Klamath and Modoc Tribes and the Yahooskin Band of Snake Indians.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. COSTELLO]?

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not see why there should be any objection to this bill. These Indians use their own money, which is in the Treasury of the United States, to buy certain pieces of land within their reservation or just outside of it. It is their own money and it is in the Treasury of the United States. The Government is paying 4 percent. The land is to be deeded to the Government of the United States to be held in trust for the Indians and there cannot be any objection. The Budget objected on the ground that they ought to come back every year to the Congress.

Mr. COSTELLO. I may say to the gentleman that there are two provisions in this bill. The second provision is as he states. It authorizes the use of private funds to acquire additional land for the benefit of the Indians. But the first part of the bill, as I understand it, would allow the Indians to deed back to the Federal Government land which they now hold in fee, and it is hard for me to understand what the program of the Department of the Interior is going to be, whether it will be to try to rehabilitate the Indians and make it possible for them to be self-sustaining, or, having turned the land over to the Indians in order to allow them to take care of themselves, we are now going to turn around, take the land back, and hold it forever in trust and keep the Indians forever as wards of the Government. This appears to be a reversal of the previous policy of the Department of the Interior, and I fail to see the real purpose in doing that.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. This involves small areas. They are scattered. What they are trying to do is get the Indian land all together and united. That is the reason that provision is in here. It pertains to small areas outside and they are scattered and they want to turn that land back.

Mr. COSTELLO. Apparently the purpose is to keep the Indians constantly under the dominion of the Federal Government.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. COSTELLO]?

There was no objection.

FRED B. WOODARD

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9432, to limit the operation of sections 109 and 113 of the Criminal Code, and section 190 of the Revised Statutes of the United States with respect to certain counsel.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I object.

EASEMENT FOR A ROAD RIGHT-OF-WAY OVER THE COAST GUARD RESERVATION AT FLAGLER BEACH, FLA.

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 3958, to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to grant to the Road Department of the State of Florida an easement for a road right-of-way over the Coast Guard Reservation at Flagler Beach, Fla.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to grant to the Road Department of the State of Florida an easement to construct and maintain a highway across such of the lands constituting a part of the Coast Guard Reservation at Flagler Beach, Fla., as the Secretary may designate. Such easement shall be granted subject to such reasonable conditions as the Secretary may deem desirable to be included therein for the purpose of enabling the United States to use the reservation in such manner as the Government's interests may require.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EMERGENCY PROVISIONS FOR VESSELS AFFECTED BY NEUTRALITY ACT OF 1939

The Clerk called the next business, Senate Joint Resolution 260, to make emergency provision for the maintenance of essential vessels affected by the Neutrality Act of 1939, and for adjustment of obligations with respect to such vessels.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact there is a rule outstanding for the consideration of this joint resolution, and in view of the fact it has to do with our neutrality and is rather complicated, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH]?

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I hate very much to object but I shall be compelled to do so. May I state to the gentleman that while there is a rule outstanding for the consideration of this joint resolution, there are 17 rules on the Speaker's desk.

This joint resolution arises by reason of the Neutrality Act which blocked out ships from combat zones. This joint resolution does not undertake to permit ships to go into combat zones. Those ships that were blocked out first were then redistributed and some were sent to the Mediterranean. Now we are confronted with another proclamation under the Neutrality Act, and what we are trying to do by this joint resolution is not to authorize those ships to go into pohibited areas, but to secure legislation whereby the Maritime Commission in the manner prescribed by this act may provide so that those ships can continue in some operation and be ready for use in the event of an emergency and to provide for reimbursement. It does not encroach upon the Neutrality Act at all, but arises by reason of the Neutrality Act.

Mr. FISH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this occasion merely to say to the House, particularly those who voted for the neutrality bill for so many years, and finally those who renewed their vote the last time it was up for consideration, that in my humble opinion the Neutrality Act which prohibits American ships going into the war zone has been the reason for keeping America out of this European war.

Mr. BLAND. I say to the gentleman, this is not sending ships into the combat area; the joint resolution provides that adjustments may be made whereby the ships may be laid up, at a smaller cost than probably would be the case on subsidies; or for postponement of the maturity dates for these vessels that are in essential services, or rearrangement of maturities; the postponement or cancelation of interest, extending merely, and not canceling, any obligation that has been made; the extension of the 20-year life limitation; and temporary or emergency employment so that the ships can be kept in condition and can be ready for use.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, in order to ask the gentleman if there is any provision in this joint resolution which directly or indirectly will permit machinations to declare any of these ships surplus and violate our Neutrality Act by selling and sending them 3,000 miles across the sea to some foreign country, in the same manner that we have violated our American neutrality by selling and sending a number of our badly needed planes from our wholly inadequate supply of fighting planes. The President said that we cannot have our cake and eat it, too, when he delivered a message to Congress several weeks ago. We cannot have our national defense and at the same time sell and send its implements 3,000 miles across the sea.

Mr. BLAND. No; this is to take the ships out of the areas where they cannot go, to keep them from being laid up, and to use them in other essential services.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. There is no provision in this joint resolution under which one of these New Deal brain-trusters in the Attorney General's office can write manifestos or misinterpretations of the law whenever he sees fit, under which these ships can be sold and sent 3,000 miles across the sea, as was recently done in the case of our Army and Navy battle planes?

Mr. BLAND. My answer is absolutely no.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. VAN ZANDT. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. VAN ZANDT. I object.

EXCHANGE OF COAST GUARD SITES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9995, to amend the act of April 6, 1938 (52 Stat. 201), entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange sites at Miami Beach, Dade County, Fla., for Coast Guard purposes."

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of April 6, 1938 (52 Stat. 201), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to exchange the existing Coast Guard sites located at Miami Beach, Dade County (commonly known as the House of Refuge property), and at Fort Lauderdale, Broward County (commonly known as the Base SIX property), in the State of Florida, or either of them, for any other site or sites, or facilities thereon, or both, located in either of said counties, which are determined by a board of Coast Guard officers, appointed by the Commandant, to be adequate consideration for such exchange and suitable for Coast Guard purposes, subject to the approval of the Secretary: Provided, That the title to any land acquired in this manner shall be subject to the approval of the Attorney General: Provided further, That any conveyance by the Government under this act shall be by a quitclaim deed.

"SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to enter into such contracts, accept such bonds or other undertakings, and perform any and all other acts as he deems necessary to protect the interests of the United States in carrying out the provisions of this act."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BOULDER CANYON PROJECT ADJUSTMENT

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9877, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to promulgate and to put into effect charges for electrical energy generated at Boulder Dam, providing for the application of revenues from said project, authorizing the operation of the Boulder Power Plant by the United States directly or through agents, and for other purposes.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

RULES OF PROCEDURE IN CRIMINAL CASES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4587, to give the Supreme Court of the United States authority to prescribe rules of pleading, practice, and procedure with respect to proceedings in criminal cases prior to and including verdict, or finding or plea of guilty.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Supreme Court of the United States shall have the power to prescribe, from time to time, rules of pleading, practice, and procedure with respect to any or all proceedings prior to and including verdict, or finding of guilty or not guilty by the court if a jury has been waived, or plea of guilty, in criminal cases in district courts of the United States, including the district courts of Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, Canal Zone, and the Virgin Islands, in the Supreme Courts of Hawaii and Puerto Rico, in the United States Court for China, and in proceedings before United States commissioners. Such rules shall take effect 6 months after their promulgation, and thereafter all laws in conflict therewith shall be of no further force and effect.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 5, strike out "Such rules shall take effect 6 months after their promulgation" and insert in lieu thereof "Such rules shall not take effect until they shall have been reported to Congress by the Attorney General at the beginning of a regular session thereof and until after the close of such session."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MARINE WAR-RISK INSURANCE

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6572, to amend the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, as amended, to provide for marine war-risk insurance and reinsurance and for marine risk reinsurance and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. BLAND. May I say to the gentleman that while ordinarily I would not ask that this bill be passed on the consent calendar, yet there is a very serious situation when you consider that marine insurance has its headquarters in London, and in marine insurance the market is likely to be lost in a very short time. This is similar to the bill we passed in the World War. We are providing insurance here, which is the life blood of a merchant marine, in order that the ships may sail not to belligerent zones, for everything in this bill about going to belligerent zones has been cut out, but we are providing simply for American ships with American goods complying with the Neutrality Act.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Is it not a fact that insurance corporations in the United States write this kind of insurance? I have in my office records indicating that the firm of Roosevelt & Sargent, of Boston, Mass., has written a considerable amount of maritime insurance on our American Merchant Marine, which is subsidized from our American taxpayers' Treasury.

Mr. BLAND. But they do not write all of it. It is customary with American insurance, in view of the large amounts involved, to reinsure, and this reinsurance is done in the London market.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman mean to tell me that the firm of Roosevelt & Sargent, of Boston, which has written insurance on a large part of our American merchant marine, which is subsidized from our almost bankrupt Federal Treasury, has been selling British insurance to Uncle Sam? I think it is about time to stop buying British and begin to buy American.

Mr. BLAND. It is reinsurance and I agree with the gentleman, but it has simply been since we have been getting ships under our own flag that we have been able to build up a marine-insurance business in this country.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I object to this socialist measure, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. THILL. I object, Mr. Speaker.

MARJORIE PARK, TAMPA, FLA.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9981, to authorize the construction of certain facilities in Marjorie Park, Davis Island, Tampa, Fla., and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Federal Works Administrator be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept on behalf of the United States of America, without cost, title to a tract of land in Marjorie Park, Davis Island, Tampa, Fla., suitable for use for the site of a United States quarantine station.

SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $76,000 to be expended by the Federal Works Administrator, for the construction and installation of such buildings, utilities, and appurtenances thereto on the tract of land herein authorized to be acquired to replace the existing United States quarantine station adjoining MacDill Field, Fla.

SEC. 3. Upon completion of the construction above authorized, the Federal Works Administrator is hereby authorized and directed to transfer to the control and jurisdiction of the Secretary of War as an addition to MacDill Field, Fla., or for use for other military purposes, the land and improvements now comprising the United States quarantine station adjoining MacDill Field, Fla.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CIVIL AERONAUTICS AUTHORITY

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9899, extending the jurisdiction of the Civil Aeronautics Authority over certain air-mail services, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice. I understand the hearings have not been printed.

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I inquire what is the objection to the bill?

Mr. JENNINGS. I understand the hearings have not been printed. This is an important bill and one that will have a far-reaching effect.

Mr. LEA. The committee was unanimous after a full hearing on the matter.

Mr. JENNINGS. I shall have to object unless the bill goes over.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his objection? There is nothing in this bill which will at all affect anything in the United States, and it should be passed.

Mr. EDMISTON. The Civil Aeronautics Authority requested this legislation so they could continue this air-mail pick-up service.

Mr. BULWINKLE. May I ask the gentleman to withdraw his objection?

Mr. EDMISTON. It was unanimously reported by the committee.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENNINGS. I yield.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. I may say to the gentleman from Tennessee that many cities in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and West Virginia which have no airports are denied air-mail service due to the Post Office Department and the C. A. A. having no authority to operate air-mail pick-up service. If this amendment is adopted immediately, within 60 or 90 days, thousands of people in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and West Virginia will again enjoy the privilege of air-mail service.

Mr. JENNINGS. I understand the Postmaster General refused to give his consent to it.

Mr. SNYDER. Oh, no.

Mr. JENNINGS. I shall have to ask, Mr. Speaker, that the bill go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OF TRANSPORTATION ACT OF 1920

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 10014, to amend the Transportation Act, 1920, as amended.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That title II of the Transportation Act, 1920 (41 Stat. 457), as amended, is hereby further amended by adding at the end of that title the following new section:

"SEC. 213. With respect to any bonds, notes, or other securities acquired on behalf of the United States under the provisions of this act, including, without limitation of the foregoing, any securities acquired as an incident to a bankruptcy, receivership, or reorganization proceeding, or by assignment, transfer, substitution, or issuance, or by purchase, default, or other acquisition (whether at a foreclosure sale or otherwise) of collateral given for the payment of obligations to the United States, the President, or any officer, agent, or agency he may designate, is authorized to sell, exchange, or otherwise dispose of any such bonds, notes, or other securities, or to enter into arrangements for the extension of the maturity thereof, in such manner, in such amounts, at such prices, for cash, securities, or other property, or any combination thereof, and upon such terms and conditions as the President or any officer, agent, or agency so designated may deem advisable and in the public interest."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE WASHINGTON NATIONAL AIRPORT

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 3927, to provide for the administration of the Washington National Airport, and for other purposes.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have the attention of some of the members of the District of Columbia Committee. I understand that existing law, probably wisely, limits the administration of the Civil Aeronautics Authority to leasing the property of the new Washington National Airport by granting revocable licenses. Section 3 of this bill, and I hope some one will read it here, is very broad, and it seems to me would stand some amendment. At least more discussion should be had on this measure than is afforded on the consent calendar. The report states that this field will be ready early this fall, while I have heard numerous reports that it will not be ready for several years.

If the chairman of the committee desires to make a statement I would be very glad to yield to him.

Mr. LEA. This airport is expected to be in operation before the first of the year.

Mr. CHURCH. The letter in the report says that, but what is the evidence in the hearings as to when it will be ready?

Mr. LEA. The evidence is that it will be open probably in October of this year.

Mr. CHURCH. The Washington airport in shape at that time? This legislation seems to me very premature.

Mr. LEA. Oh, no. It is going to be necessary to grant concessions there. For instance, the air lines will have concessions to conduct their ticket offices inside the building, and there will be concessions for a restaurant. The concessions will amount probably to $100,000 a year. It will be much more valuable to the Government, if they can be let for a definite period, so it is the best proposition to give this authority. This authority should be granted before the airport goes into operation, in order that the concessionaires may move in and begin to operate in their business.

Mr. CHURCH. Section 3 of the bill provides:

The Administrator is empowered to lease, upon such terms as he may deem proper, space or property within or upon the airport for the purposes essential or appropriate to the operation of the airport.

The old plan is done away with, unless you amend this bill in some way. It leaves the terms of the leases entirely to the discretion of the Administrator.

Mr. LEA. The Civil Aeronautics Authority gives the Administrator the right to make a lease on revocable conditions, while this would broaden the authority and give him the right to make a lease for a time definite.

Mr. CHURCH. Will the gentleman give me an illustration where an exception is made to the requirement that leases to Government property be on revocable conditions? Why should this law be changed in this instance?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHURCH. Yes.

Mr. BULWINKLE. This is different from anything that we have had heretofore.

Mr. CHURCH. It is different?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes; for this reason. Out at this airport there will be a restaurant, and they are contemplating putting in $150,000 worth of equipment. That is, the people who run the restaurant contemplate putting $150,000 worth of equipment into it. We have nothing like that on any other Government property. These men are putting up immense sums of money in order to make this a great airport, and we want to lease it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. Will these concessions be let out by competitive bidding, or is the one who is going to have charge to be permitted to designate any one he wants to go there?

Mr. BULWINKLE. No; my understanding is this: that he is going to survey the field, and do the best he can to get the best results. That is what I understood. There is to be no competitive bidding.

Mr. RICH. How is that to be determined?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Here is a man who says that he is going to equip his restaurant in such and such a way and that he will pay such an amount. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Here are two air lines that are coming in to this airport or perhaps three. Is the gentleman going to say to them that they must bid for this space?

Mr. RICH. Oh, that is an entirely different proposition. These air lines come in here and they will make a charge which everybody will have to pay.

Mr. BULWINKLE. They are charged with the space in this field and that is what they are going to do with the others.

Mr. RICH. Whenever we let contracts for anything that the Government purchases we let it out at competitive bidding. It seems to me that is what they should do here.

Mr. LEA. The Government sells service. The air lines will have their offices inside this airport and will pay rent to the Government. It is important that this should be for a definite period instead of revocable at will.

Mr. RICH. What is the cost of this airport? What will it cost the Government when we complete it?

Mr. LEA. I could not give you the figure, but it is an expensive airport and these rentals may exceed $100,000 a year.

Mr. RICH. Who knows what this is going to cost? Can you get those figures?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes; we can get them.

Mr. RICH. Will you insert them in the RECORD—the total cost of this airport?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes.

Mr. RICH. How are they going to figure out the revenue——

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I refuse to yield further.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

EASEMENT TO CERTAIN LAND IN CITY OF FARGO, N. DAK.

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 2059, authorizing a grant to the city of Fargo, N. Dak., of an easement in connection with the construction of water and sewer systems.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Administrator of the Civil Aeronautics Authority is authorized and directed to grant to the city of Fargo, N. Dak., a permanent easement authorizing such city to construct and maintain a system of interceptor or trunk sewer lines and water mains under the west 60 feet of a tract of land owned by the United States and located north of such city of Fargo, in Cass County, N. Dak., such tract of land being now used as the site of an airways radio and range station, and is more specifically described as follows: Beginning at the northwest corner southeast quarter of section 30, township 140 north, range 48 west, fifth principal meridian; thence east 880 feet to a point; thence south 645 feet to a point; thence west 880 feet to a point; thence north 645 feet to the place of beginning, containing in all 13$\frac{1}{33}$ acres.

The easement authorized to be granted by this act shall be in lieu of the license revocable at the will of the Secretary of Commerce, granted to such city by a certain instrument dated December 20, 1934, and executed by Ewing Y. Mitchell, Assistant Secretary of Commerce, as amended by a certain instrument dated March 12, 1935, and executed by the said Ewing Y. Mitchell. Such easement shall be granted subject to such reasonable conditions as the Secretary of Commerce may deem desirable to include in the grant for the purpose of preventing interference with the operation and maintenance of the air-navigation facilities now or hereafter located upon such tract of land.

SEC. 2. Such easement shall be granted subject to the following condition:

(1) The grantee shall not use any machines or erect any temporary structures on said land that will extend more than 10 feet above the surface of the immediately surrounding area without permission of the operator in charge of the station or erect any permanent structures above the ground;

(2) None of the operations of the city in the exercise of any of the privileges granted by this easement shall interfere in any way with any wires, cables, conduits, pipes, sewers, or other structures of any kind or character now installed in or across such tract or hereafter installed in such tract by the Government or by any subsequent owner of any part of the tract;

(3) The grantee shall not make any excavations that will prevent or at any time unduly impede ingress and egress to the rest of the tract and, upon making any excavations, shall promptly restore the soil and surface of the land to its former condition;

(4) Such other reasonable conditions as the Administrator in the Civil Aeronautics Authority may deem desirable for the purpose of preventing interference with the operation and maintenance of the air-navigation facilities now or hereafter located upon such tract of land.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 5, after the word "meridian" strike out the balance of the line and all of lines 6, 7, 8, and 9, and the word "acres" in line 10, and insert, "thence north along the north and south quarter line 75 feet to a point, thence east parallel to the east and west quarter line 880 feet to a point; thence south 720 feet to a point; thence west parallel to the east and west quarter line 880 feet to a point on the north and south quarter line; thence north along the north and south quarter line 645 feet to the point of beginning, containing 14.55 acres, more or less."

Page 2, line 26, strike out the words "Such ease", and all of lines 1 to 5, inclusive, on page 3.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING A RADIO-MONITORING STATION IN MASSACHUSETTS

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 2611, authorizing the purchase of a site and the erection of a building in the State of Massachusetts for use as a radio-monitoring station, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Federal Communications Commission be, and it is hereby, authorized to purchase for the United States a suitable site in the State of Massachusetts, provided a suitable site now owned by the Government is not available for the purpose, and cause to be erected thereon, according to plans and specifications to be approved by it, a suitable building or buildings, for use as a radio-monitoring station or to modify or reconstruct existing buildings or facilities on such site for such purpose, and to provide the necessary associated antenna systems, roadways, power, water, and sanitary facilities, including the construction and installation of goniometric apparatus and including necessary outfits, apparatus, and equipment at a total cost of said site, buildings, and equipment of not to exceed $30,000.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADDITIONAL QUARANTINE POWERS

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 2111, to amend the act entitled "An act granting additional quarantine powers and imposing additional duties upon the Marine Hospital Service," approved February 15, 1893, as amended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the committee be allowed to file a supplementary report. The gentleman from Illinois is objecting to it on account of the Ramseyer rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection first to the request of the gentleman from Illinois that the bill be passed over without prejudice?

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection. I think if the supplementary report is filed it will be very helpful to our committee. The Ramseyer rule I do not believe has been complied with in this case, but I did not want to make a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois that the bill be passed over without prejudice?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE] that the committee be permitted to file a supplementary report?

There was no objection.

RESERVE OFFICERS' TRAINING CORPS, UNIVERSITY OF ALASKA

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9391, to amend section 40, National Defense Act, as amended, relating to the organization of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, so as to provide for an exception with respect to the University of Alaska.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alaska just what this bill does?

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, under existing law it is necessary that there must be 100 physically fit students at any college or university for the formation of an infantry R. O. T. C. unit. Only 50 are required for some other branches of the service. At the University of Alaska the War Department desires the formation of an infantry unit, but only 77 students could have been furnished during the past year. We anticipate there will be about 80 the coming year. The bill before us fixes the minimum number at 50, instead of 100 as required by existing law, for the University of Alaska. Nevertheless, in the interest of national defense it is desirable to have those 80 or 50 students, or however many there may be, in a Reserve Officers' Training Corps unit at that university. The War Department reports that the additional expense involved is so small that it will not call for any additional appropriation.

Mr. RICH. Are those boys subject to call?

Mr. DIMOND. Just the same as others. Once they go into the R. O. T. C. unit under this act they will be in the same status as any other boys similarly situated.

Mr. RICH. Are those boys who mostly live in Alaska?

Mr. DIMOND. I should say 90 percent of them live in Alaska.

Mr. RICH. And they would be subject to service there at any time?

Mr. DIMOND. Oh, yes. Under existing world conditions, and having in mind particularly the physical position of Alaska and our relations with the two most powerful nations on the other side of the Pacific, it is of considerable national consequence that we provide in Alaska itself all factors of defense possible. While it is true that 60, or 70, or 80 men to be trained each year are not of imposing strength, it would, I submit, be unwise not to make use of these young men in the most efficient possible way by preparing them for service through the training which they will receive as members of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps at the University of Alaska. Since the students at the university desire to undertake this training, it would be a shame to deny them the opportunity because in number they are something under 100.

While there is no occasion to become unduly alarmed at any action taken by our neighbors in eastern Asia, it would be folly for us not to give proper attention to the really enormous military and naval developments, and particularly developments in air, which have occurred in that area in recent years. A few days ago I had occasion to invite the attention of the House to the fortifications, both military and naval, of Komandorsky Islands which lie so close to our own Aleutian Islands, fortifications in the construction of which a considerable number of Germans have participated. The Komandorsky Islands lie within a short distance of our own Aleutian Islands and, therefore, furnish, as it were, a stepping stone between Soviet Russia and Japan on one hand, and the United States on the other.

Information came to me recently further indicating the activity of Soviet Russia in the Bering Sea area at the point where Russian Siberia most closely approaches Alaska, namely, at Bering Strait. The distance between the main bodies of Siberia and the United States is approximately 54 miles. Almost in the middle of the Strait lie two islands less than two miles apart, one called Big Diomede, which belongs to Russia, and the other called Little Diomede, which is a part of the Territory of Alaska.

Until the present summer both islands were inhabited almost entirely by Eskimos. The only white men on Big Diomede were a Russian administrator and his assistant, and the only white people on Little Diomede were a missionary and two school teachers. Recently the Eskimos from Little Diomede Island have reported the influx of a considerable number of Russians to Big Diomede Island, one report saying that the newcomers amounted to thousands. While there may be some exaggeration in these reports as to numbers, it seems certain that a substantial number of Russians are now on Big Diomede Island. This island is rocky and relatively inhospitable, and there would be no occasion for its settlement by Russians except for purposes of military fortifications.

What I have said is brought to the attention of the House in order to enforce my point that any measure which we can here take looking toward the better defense of Alaska, and thus toward the better defense of the United States, we ought to take without hesitation, and at the earliest possible moment. If by passing this bill we can train between 50 and 100 young Alaskans each year to serve our Nation more effectively in time of need, it would be, indeed, unwise to neglect to take such a step.

Hearings were had on the bill before the Committee on Military Affairs, and at the conclusion thereof a favorable report was ordered. The chairman was generous enough to designate me as the member of the committee to make the report. In the printing of the report, through a clerical error, the second word of the seventh paragraph of the report was written "opposition," whereas the word is and should be "position." That particular sentence should read as follows:

Alaska's position is of such importance in plans of national defense that within the last 2 years Congress has appropriated substantial sums of money for the establishment of naval air bases at Sitka and at Kodiak, Alaska, and an Army cold-weather experimental station at Fairbanks, Alaska, and, more recently, for an Army air base at Anchorage, Alaska.

The following excerpts from the report on the bill, embracing the correction above noted, will more fully explain the objects and purposes of the measure:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9391) to amend section 40, National Defense Act, as amended, relating to the organization of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, so as to provide for an exception with respect to the University of Alaska, having considered the same, report favorably thereon without amendment and recommend that the bill do pass.

The purpose of the bill is to so amend section 40 of the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, as amended, as to make possible the establishment of a Reserve Officers' Training Corps infantry unit at the University of Alaska, with a minimum of 50 physically fit male students.

Existing law on the subject provides as follows:

"Provided, That no such unit shall be established or maintained at any institution until an officer of the Regular Army shall have been detailed as professor of military science and tactics, nor until such institution shall maintain under military instruction at least 100 physically fit male students, except that in the case of units other than infantry, cavalry, or artillery, the minimum number shall be 50."

From the foregoing it appears that a minimum of 100 students is required for the maintenance of an infantry, artillery, or cavalry Reserve Officers' Training Corps unit, but that units in other branches of the Army may be established with a minimum of 50 students. It is sought by the bill, in the case of the University of Alaska, to make 50 the minimum number for the establishment of an infantry Reserve Officers' Training Corps unit.

The Territory of Alaska is vast in area, containing about 589,000 square miles, and at the present time has a population of approximately 72,000, of which an estimated 41,000 belong to the white race, and the remaining 31,000 to the native Eskimo, Aleut, and Indian races.

The University of Alaska is situated about 3 miles from the city of Fairbanks, Alaska, near the center of the Territory in latitude approximately 65° north. The total enrollment of the university for the year ending June 30, 1940, was 268. It is a coeducational institution. Most of the students attending the university are residents of Alaska and a majority of those were born in the Territory. It is the only institution of higher learning in Alaska. The university gives courses in agriculture, arts and letters, business administration, chemistry, civil engineering, education, general science, home economics, mining and mining engineering.

Alaska's position is of such importance in the plans for national defense that within the last 2 years Congress has appropriated substantial sums of money for the establishment of naval air bases at Sitka and at Kodiak, Alaska, and an Army cold-weather experimental station at Fairbanks, Alaska, and, more recently, for an Army air base at Anchorage, Alaska. The Navy Department is now asking for the establishment of a Navy air base at Unalaska, Alaska.

It is entirely proper that the people of Alaska should contribute to the national defense in the Territory. They are eager to make such contribution. At their request, two National Guard units have been authorized for Alaska and it is expected that those units will be established at an early date, as soon as facilities can be had. During the past year an attempt was made to establish an R. O. T. C. unit at the university and 77 freshmen and sophomores completed the course in military science. However, it now appears that unless this legislation is passed the unit cannot be maintained. Judging by the expansion of the enrollment of the university in past years, it seems highly probable that an R. O. T. C. unit established there will expand in numbers from year to year so that it will soon be more than 100. The enactment of the bill will permit the establishment of a unit immediately and thus contribute through the training of students in military science to the defense of the Territory and of the Nation.

The Secretary of War reports that the cost of the unit and its maintenance for the fiscal years 1940 and 1941 will be negligible and that no additional appropriations for those years will be necessary.

The bill was submitted to the Bureau of the Budget which reports that there is no objection to its enactment.

Upon introduction the bill was referred, in the usual course, to the Secretary of War for an expression of his views with respect thereto. Under date of May 28, the Secretary of War addressed a letter to the chairman of the committee, favoring enactment of the bill. That letter is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 28, 1940.

Hon. ANDREW J. MAY,
Chairman, Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. MAY: Responsive to your request of April 16, 1940, the War Department submits the following report on H. R. 9391, to amend section 40, National Defense Act, as amended, relating to the organization of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, so as to provide for an exception with respect to the University of Alaska.

Section 40, National Defense Act, at present states "* * * that no such unit (Reserve Officers' Training Corps) shall be established or maintained at any institution until such institution shall maintain under military instruction at least 100 physically fit male students, except that in case of units other than infantry, cavalry, or artillery the minimum number shall be 50: * * *."

The proposed legislation changes the above language in such a manner as to require a minimum of 50 physically fit male students for an infantry unit instead of 100. The amendment applies only to the University of Alaska.

The War Department desires to establish and maintain an infantry Reserve Officers' Training Corps unit at the University of Alaska as a special defense measure. It is not feasible to establish a unit other than infantry at that institution. The authorities of the University of Alaska desire this unit. Because of the comparatively small student enrollment, the university cannot meet the requirement of enrolling at least 100 physically fit male students, but gives assurance that it can enroll more than 50. Therefore, the proposed bill will enable the War Department to establish and maintain this desired unit.

The War Department would not favor such a change in section 40 of the National Defense Act for the Reserve Officers' Training Corps generally, but does favor this bill because of the special defense requirements of the Territory of Alaska.

The cost of the establishment of this unit and its maintenance for the fiscal years 1940 and 1941 will be negligible. Therefore, no additional appropriation for these years will be necessary.

This proposed legislation was submitted to the Bureau of the Budget which reports that there would be no objection to the submission of this report.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY H. WOODRING,
Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 40 of the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, as amended, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following additional proviso: "Provided further, That an infantry unit may be established and maintained at the University of Alaska upon the condition that this institution shall maintain under military instruction at least 50 physically fit male students."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the subject of this bill and to include excerpts from the report on the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

BRIDGE OVER SUSQUEHANNA RIVER NEAR HARRISBURG, PA.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9618, to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Susquehanna River at or near the city of Harrisburg, Pa.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Susquehanna River, at or near the city of Harrisburg, Pa., authorized to be built by the Dauphin County (Pa.) Authority by an act of Congress approved August 7, 1939, are hereby extended 1 and 3 years, respectively, from May 1, 1940.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

USE OF THE PUBLIC DOMAIN

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9389, to more effectively utilize certain lands of the public domain, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will not the gentleman from Utah [Mr. ROBINSON] explain the bill?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. The purpose of the bill is set forth in the report. Principally, the bill restores 12,000 acres of land to the Goshute Indian Reservation in Utah. Also, it gives these tribes of Indians the right to sue.

Mr. RICH. Are we going to dedicate this land to the Indian tribes?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. It restores this land to the Indians. It is part of the public domain, quite barren, and of little value.

Mr. RICH. Does the Department of the Interior approve this bill?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. Yes; the Department approves this bill, and their letter is found in the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to more effectively utilize certain lands of the public domain all vacant unappropriated lands in the following-described area be, and they are hereby, added to the Goshute Reservation, subject to all valid existing rights and claims:

Township 10 south, range 19 west, and fractional sections 1, 12, 13, 24, 25, and 36, township 10 south, range 20 west, Salt Lake meridian, Utah.

With the following committee amendments:

Amendment No. 1: Strike out the language in lines 8, 9, and 10 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Sections 5, 6, 7, 8, 17, 18, 19, 20, 29, 30, 31, all in township 10 south, range 19 west, Salt Lake base and meridian.

"Lots 1 and 2 in fractional section 1, and fractional sections 12, 13, 24, 25, all in township 10 south, range 20 west, Salt Lake base and meridian.

"Lots 1, 2, 3, and 4; northeast quarter and the northeast quarter southeast quarter in fractional section 12, and fractional sections 1, 13, 24, 25, all in township 11 south, range 20 west, Salt Lake base and meridian.

"Lots 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 in fractional section 1; lots 1 and 2 in fractional section 12, all in township 12 south, range 20 west, Salt Lake base and meridian.

"The south half northeast quarter, northwest quarter, north half southwest quarter, southeast quarter southwest quarter, southeast quarter, section 23; southwest quarter, northwest quarter southeast quarter, south half southeast quarter, section 24; north half north half, south half northeast quarter, southeast quarter northwest quarter, northeast quarter southwest quarter, southwest quarter southwest quarter, southeast quarter, section 25; east half west half, northeast quarter, north half southeast quarter, southeast quarter southeast quarter, section 26; northeast quarter northwest quarter, east half, section 27; lot 2, southeast quarter northwest quarter, section 30; north half southeast quarter, section 33; and the south half southeast quarter, section 35, all in township 12 south, range 19 west, Salt Lake base and meridian."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. ROBINSON of Utah—

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. Mr. Speaker, this amendment is set forth in the report but was inadvertently left out of the bill. I ask that it be included in the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection the further reading of the committee amendment will be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

The committee amendment reads as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following: "Provided, That jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the Court of Claims to hear and determine any and all claims, which the Shoshone Nation, or any division thereof (except the Eastern Division whose claims have been adjudicated by, and the Northwestern Division whose claims are now pending in, the Court of Claims), or any tribe or band of Indians living on the Fort Hall Reservation (except the Piute Indians) including, without limitation, claims arising under or growing out of the treaty of October 1, 1863, with the Western Bands of the Shoshone Nation, the treaty of October 12, 1863, with the Shoshone-Goship bands of Indians, and the treaty of October 14, 1863, with the mixed bands of Bannocks and Shoshones, may have against the United States. The provisions of the act of February 28, 1929 (45 Stat. 1407), available and applicable to the Northwestern Division of the Shoshone Nation (northwestern bands of Shoshone Indians) shall, to the extent not inconsistent herewith, be available and applicable to the aforesaid tribes or bands, any of which may bring a suit or suits, either singly or jointly, within 5 years from the date of approval of this act in accordance with the provisions of said act of February 28, 1929: Provided further, That at the trial of any suit instituted hereunder, any letter, paper, document, map, or record relating to any claim asserted, in the possession of any officer or department of the United States or committee of Congress (or a certified copy thereof) may be used as competent evidence, and the departments of the Government of the United States shall give to the attorneys for said Indians full and free access to such letters, papers, documents, maps, or records as may be useful to said attorneys in the preparation for trial or other determination of any suit or cause of action instituted hereunder, and shall afford facilities for the examination of the same and, upon written request by said attorneys, shall furnish copies thereof: Provided further, That the United States may set off against any judgment obtained, all sums expended gratuitously for the benefit of the plaintiff except that there shall not be offset in any case (1) expenditures made prior to the event or events upon which the cause of action is based, nor (2) expenditures made under the authority of the act of June 18, 1934 (48 Stat. 984), and the extensions thereof in the acts of May 1, 1936 (49 Stat. 1260), and June 26, 1936 (49 Stat. 1967), nor (3) expenditures under any emergency appropriation or allotment made subsequently to March 4, 1933, and generally applicable throughout the United States, for rural rehabilitation or relief in stricken agricultural areas, relief from distress caused by unemployment and the conditions resulting therefrom, the prosecution of public works and public projects for the relief of unemployment and for work relief, and for the conservation and development of natural resources: Provided, however, That where land has been purchased under such emergency appropriation or allotment and the title thereto has been vested in the United States in trust for the Indian claimants, there may be offset against such claimants the value of the beneficial use of such land which is enjoyed by them."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TRANSPORTATION OF FOREIGN MAILS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9990, to amend section 4008 of the Revised Statutes, relating to transportation of foreign mails.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4008 of the Revised Statutes (39 U. S. C., sec. 653) is hereby amended to read as follows: "The mail between the United States and any foreign port, or touching at a foreign port between ports of the United States, shall be transported by such means as in the judgment of the Postmaster General may promote the efficiency of the foreign mail service."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ESTABLISHMENT OF FOREIGN POSTAL AGENCIES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9991, to amend section 4021 of the Revised Statutes and to repeal section 4023 of the Revised Statutes, relating to establishment of postal agencies.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4021 of the Revised Statutes (39 U. S. C., sec. 672) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4021. The Postmaster General may establish postal agencies at such foreign seaports or airports at which United States mail steamers or airships touch to land and receive mails, as may in his judgment promote the efficiency of the foreign mail service; and he may pay the postal agents employed thereat a reasonable compensation for their services, in addition to the necessary expenses for office rent, office furniture, clerk hire, and incidental expenses."

SEC. 2. Section 4023 of the Revised Statutes (39 U. S. C., sec. 674) is hereby repealed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LAND TITLES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9736, to amend section 355 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, to authorize the Attorney General to approve the title to low-value lands and interests in lands acquired by or on behalf of the United States subject to infirmities, and for other purposes.

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

USE OF THE PUBLIC DOMAIN

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9705, to make more effective use of certain parts of the public domain, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby added to the Uintah and Ouray Reservation, subject to any valid existing rights, 61,389.89 acres, more or less, of undisposed-of, surplus, opened lands of said reservation, described as follows:

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe (1) to exchange any lands or interest in lands described in section 1, including water rights or surface rights to such lands, for other lands or interests in lands as aforesaid, in which event or events the lands parted with shall cease to be a part of the Uintah-Ouray Reservation and the lands obtained shall become a part thereof; and (2) to purchase and acquire other lands in which event or events the land so purchased or acquired shall become a part of such reservation. Except as in section 1 hereof, no lands in Utah shall be added to any reservation under the provisions of section 3 of the act of June 18, 1934 (48 Stat. 984), and any lands formerly belonging to any Indian reservation in said State to the extent that they have not been disposed of by the United States are hereby declared to be the absolute property of the United States, free from any trust restrictions.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed, subject to any valid existing rights, to establish a grazing unit within Utah Grazing District No. 8, to be administered by the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for the exclusive use and benefit of the Indians of the Uintah and Ouray Reservation. Said unit shall consist of an area of unappropriated public lands adjacent to the base properties of the Uintah and Ouray Indians and commensurate with but not exceeding the grazing rights of such base properties determined in accordance with range requirement standards adopted by the Grazing Service of the Department of the Interior. Such grazing unit shall be subject to all statutes and administrative orders and regulations applicable to the administration of Indian affairs.

SEC. 4. The State of Utah may, if it desires, relinquish to the United States any tracts of school or other State-owned lands, surveyed or unsurveyed, within the area described in section 3 hereof, and said State shall have the right to make selections in lieu thereof outside of said area, equal in value to the lands relinquished, from the vacant, unappropriated, public lands within the State of Utah, such lieu selections to be made in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, which shall be made after obtaining suggestions from the Utah State Land Board, but in any event within 90 days after enactment hereof. No fee or commission shall be charged for any exchange of land made hereunder. The value of improvements owned by the State on lands relinquished by the State shall be taken into consideration and full credit in the form of public lands shall be allowed therefor.

With the following committee amendment:

At the end of the bill add a new section No. 5 reading as follows:

"SEC. 5. In any suit instituted in the Court of Claims under the Act of June 28, 1938 (52 Stat. 1209), there shall be set off against any recovery, in lieu of the set-off provisions contained in section 5 thereof, any payment made by the United States on any claim asserted by said band and all sums expended gratuitously by the United States for the benefit of said band, except that there shall not be offset in any suit (1) expenditures made prior to the time the cause of action sued upon arose, (2) expenditures made under the authority of the Act of June 18, 1934 (48 Stat. 984), and the extensions thereof in the Acts of May 1, 1936 (49 Stat. 1260) and June 26, 1936 (49 Stat. 1967), (3) expenditures made for education or in fulfillment of obligations assumed by the United States under treaties or acts of Congress, (4) expenditures made under any emergency appropriation or allotment made subsequently to March 4, 1933, and generally applicable throughout the United States, for rural rehabilitation or relief in stricken agricultural areas, relief from distress caused by unemployment and the conditions resulting therefrom, the prosecution of public works and public projects for the relief of unemployment and for work relief, and for the conservation and development of natural resources: Provided, however, That where land has been purchased under such emergency appropriation or allotment and the title thereto has been vested in the United States in trust for the benefit of such band, there may be offset the value of the beneficial use thereof, it being the intent of this act that it shall supersede the act of March 3, 1909 (35 Stat. 788), and that any and all bands of the Ute Indians may assert any and all claims which have accrued against the United States since the Ute Indians acknowledged themselves to be under the exclusive jurisdiction thereof (9 Stat. 984) and that the United States may set off against any amount found due on any claim asserted any and all payments made thereon, whether pursuant to judgment of a court, statute of Congress, or otherwise, and the aforesaid gratuities.

"With respect to any suit instituted under said act of June 28, 1938 (52 Stat. 1209), the Supreme Court of the United States shall have authority to review, as in other cases, any final judgment, or any judgment relating to the right of the plaintiff to recover but which reserves for further proceedings the determination of the amount of the recovery and the amount of offsets rendered.

"If in any suit instituted under said act of June 28, 1938 (52 Stat. 1209), the Court shall find that any band or bands of Ute Indians entered into a treaty with the United States, negotiated by an agent thereof, whereby such band or bands agreed to surrender, give up, or relinquish to the United States the possessory right of occupancy in and to certain described lands, and in substantial compliance with the provisions thereof, did give up, surrender, or relinquish to the United States the occupation of said lands and that the United States notwithstanding its failure to ratify said treaty or treaties assented to or accepted the benefits of such giving up, surrender, or relinquishment, it is hereby declared that such action shall be sufficient grounds for equitable relief and the Court shall enter judgment in favor of said Indians for the value of said lands as of the time the right of occupancy thereto was given up, surrendered, or relinquished to the United States: Provided, That said judgment shall not as respects such cause of action include any increment, interest, or equivalent thereof, from the date of taking to the date of judgment, as an element of just compensation or otherwise; and this proviso is not severable from the provisions of this paragraph: Provided further, That the words 'range 35' wherever appearing in section 6 of said act of June 28, 1938 (52 Stat. 1209), shall be construed to mean 'township 35 north': Provided further, That in awarding compensation to the attorney or attorneys prosecuting any suit under said Act, the Court of Claims, or the Secretary of the Interior, as the case may be, shall consider all services rendered by said attorney or attorneys under said act, including services rendered before the Members and committees of Congress, the departments of the Government, and the courts, with respect to all suits instituted thereunder: Provided, further, That actual expenses of said attorney or attorneys incurred or expended in the prosecution of any suits instituted under said act shall be paid as provided in the contracts approved by the Secretary of the Interior under which such suits are instituted."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DAM AND DIKE, NORTH SLOUGH, COOS COUNTY, OREG.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6408, to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a dam and dike for preventing the flow of tidal waters into North Slough in Coos County, Oreg.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a dam and dike for preventing the flow of tidal waters into North Slough in Coos County, Oreg., in township 24 south, range 13 west, Willamette meridian, authorized to be constructed by the State of Oregon, acting through its highway department, the North Slough drainage district, and the North Slough diking district, by an act of Congress approved August 26, 1937, is extended 1 and 3 years, respectively, from August 26, 1939.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 2, strike out "1939" and insert in lieu thereof "1940."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TO INCREASE THE SIZE OF THE REGULAR ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 10010, to increase the size of the Regular Army of the United States.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to object, I believe that because of the importance of this bill the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs should explain it to the House.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, the bill is a very simple one. Under the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, the maximum strength of the United States Regular Army is placed at 280,000 members. This bill merely strikes out the figures "280,000" and inserts in lieu thereof "400,000." It would authorize the enlistments to be increased from 280,000 to 400,000. That is all it does.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield.

Mr. FISH. All this bill does is to increase the size of the Regular Army from 280,000 to 400,000.

Mr. MAY. That is all.

Mr. FISH. That is all. But it is one of the most important bills that could be before the Congress, and to my mind it is a very sound bill.

It is amazing that we should consider this bill here by unanimous consent and without any discussion, and I hope the gentleman will continue and do a little more explaining as to exactly what it does.

Mr. CHURCH. As I understand it, this bill is different. The Congress has already appropriated for 375,000 men?

Mr. MAY. Yes.

Mr. CHURCH. Therefore, this is an authorization to increase the number 280,000 up to 400,000, or an increase of 120,000 men only. There is an increase in authorization for the 25,000 additional over and above the number 375,000 appropriated for?

Mr. MAY. Included in that is also 40,000 that have been authorized in the Air Corps, which belongs in the Regular Army, so there is in fact very little space allowed for getting 400,000. I may say furthermore, I agree with the gentleman from New York, it is a very sound bill. In addition to that, may I make the further agreement with him, if he will agree, it is a very essential bill and one very much needed at this time.

Mr. FISH. I want to congratulate the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs for bringing this bill in. He is absolutely right. It is a very much needed bill. Is there anything in this bill to increase the National Guard to 400,000?

Mr. MAY. It does not affect the National Guard. It is merely confined to the Regular Army.

Mr. FISH. Does not the gentleman believe that the National Guard should be increased to 400,000?

Mr. MAY. May I say to the gentleman that many members of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, including the chairman, were not satisfied with leaving the limit at 400,000. Many of us would like to have placed it at 750,000. But we thought we would be modest and reasonable about it, because the Congress will be in session on the first of January and if the exigencies of the time require more, I am satisfied the Congress will carry it out.

Mr. FISH. Does this bill carry with it not only increasing the number to 400,000 but also provide modern equipment for those 400,000?

Mr. MAY. The bill does not do anything in the world but strike out "280,000" and insert "400,000."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I say to the gentleman from Kentucky and to the gentleman from New York in reference to the question about increasing the National Guard, that the National Defense Act already authorizes a maximum strength in the National Guard of 425,000 men.

Mr. FISH. Is that being lived up to?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No. The Congress has never appropriated sufficient money.

Mr. FISH. There are only about 200,000 in the National Guard?

Mr. WADSWORTH. About 230,000, but the authorization is already in the act.

Mr. CHURCH. Would the gentleman make a statement in reference to legislation having to do with the National Guard? It is being talked about putting the National Guard under the control of the President. Can the gentleman make any statement clarifying that in view of the fact the hearings on this bill were in executive session and are not available? I would like to have your statement on that subject.

Mr. MAY. I did not get the gentleman's question.

Mr. CHURCH. People are exercised over whether or not the President is going to take charge of the National Guard. Can the gentleman clear the atmosphere in that respect?

Mr. MAY. I wish I could clear the atmosphere in many respects. However, legislation is now pending and has been reported to the House in reference to that matter and I do not think I should enter into a discussion of that bill at this time because it does not relate to this particular matter.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. If the National Guard of the States, as stated by the gentleman from New York, stands at 425,000, will the gentleman, who is head of the Military Affairs Committee, and in whom we have a lot of confidence, give us his judgment as to what we ought to do? Does he not believe that we should insist that the States be permitted or that the Government assist the States in increasing the size of the National Guard because it will not cost the Federal Treasury as much money as it would to increase the Regular Army? If we do that, we will have that many men in time of war we can draw on, and the cost will be reduced.

Mr. MAY. I agree largely with what the gentleman from Pennsylvania said. If we can reduce the cost of our Military Establishment in any way, we ought to do it. One of my reasons for agreeing with the other members of my committee in making this only 400,000 instead of 750,000 was that the whole thing might pipe down in a few months and we may not find a necessity for doing so much along these lines. However, we will have plenty to do in the meantime.

Mr. RICH. I am not objecting to that. I believe the gentleman is doing the wise thing, as he always does, but does he not believe that while we are appropriating these great sums of money we should also increase the National Guard?

Mr. MAY. The National Guard men are all State officials, yet they are members of the United States Army. They operate under the control of the Governors of the various States until a national emergency is declared by the President, at which time the President calls them for active duty in the Army.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. MOTT. Has the gentleman any information as to approximately how long it will take to recruit the Army up to the proposed authorized strength of 400,000?

Mr. MAY. About 8 months.

Mr. MOTT. Can the gentleman tell us what success the Army has had to date in recruiting up to its present authorized strength?

Mr. MAY. It has been very good, but I do not have the exact information. The increase has been steady and progressive.

Mr. EDMISTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. EDMISTON. Further answering the gentleman from Oregon, they feel that 500,000 is about the extent that may be reached by volunteers.

Mr. MOTT. Within 8 months?

Mr. EDMISTON. Yes.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Is it not true that we are adding many implements of war to the Army?

Mr. MAY. Yes.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. In addition we must add manpower if we are going to have a well-balanced army, and we will have to have 400,000 men.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of the National Defense Act, approved June 3, 1916, as amended, be further amended by striking out the words "two hundred and eighty thousand" in the last sentence of that section and substituting in lieu thereof the words "three hundred and seventy-five thousand."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 7, strike out the words "three hundred and seventy-five thousand" and insert "four hundred thousand."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERMITTING COMMUNICATION UTILITIES TO CONTRIBUTE FREE SERVICES TO THE NATIONAL DEFENSE

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 3018, to amend section 210 of the Communications Act of 1934, approved June 19, 1934 (48 Stat. 1073; 47 U. S. C. 210), so as to permit communication utilities to contribute free services to the national defense.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 210 of the Communications Act of 1934, approved June 19, 1934 (48 Stat. 1073; 47 U. S. C. 210), is hereby amended by inserting after the words "SEC. 210" the letter "(a)" and by adding at the end of the section the following subsection:

"(b) Nothing in this act or in any other provision of law shall be construed to prohibit common carriers from rendering to any agency of the Government free service in connection with the preparation for the national defense: Provided, That such free service may be rendered only in accordance with such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe therefor."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PREVENTING PUBLICATION OF INVENTIONS IN THE NATIONAL INTEREST

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10058) to amend the act relating to preventing the publication of inventions in the national interest, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CHURCH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, this bill is an important measure, and I believe it should be considered other than on the Consent Calendar. Will the gentleman give me the Consent Calendar number of this bill?

Mr. LANHAM. The Consent Calendar number of this bill is 847.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman explain the bill?

Mr. LANHAM. I should be glad to.

This is a bill unanimously reported by the Committee on Patents, a bill which is very important in the matter of our national defense, and it is desired by both the War Department and the Navy Department for that purpose. Our present patent laws provide that in time of war applications for patents on inventions that have peculiar application to national defense may be kept secret in order that those inventions may not become available to foreign governments. The provision of this bill is for a period of 2 years to permit and authorize the keeping of inventions and applications for patents therefor secret if they, in the judgment of the War Department and the Navy Department, are needed for our national defense.

In protection of the inventor the bill goes further than the law has heretofore gone in this regard. The former law provided that there should be no compensation whatever to the inventor making the application until his invention actually was used. This bill protects the inventor by making provision for compensation in case his invention is useful for national defense but is held secret in order that it may not become known to foreign governments.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Is there anything in this bill that would release the inventor so that he could make his patent public if the War and Navy Departments turned down his invention?

Mr. LANHAM. I may say that the practice is that whenever the Navy Department and the War Department find that they have in the particular field to which the invention applies better facilities for national defense than those presented by the application for the patent on the new invention, they have no objection to the granting of the patent, and the practice is to grant it.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. We have been led to believe that a good many patents on inventions have been submitted to the War or Navy Department, such as those relating to tanks and other modern implements of war, and that the admirals and generals turned them down, so the inventors took them to foreign countries.

Mr. LANHAM. As a matter of practice, there is a board on patents from both the Army and the Navy that serves with the board in the Patent Office to determine what is sufficiently important in the matter of national defense to keep the invention secret.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOLMES. I understand also that the rights of the inventors during this 2-year period are absolutely protected.

Mr. LANHAM. Absolutely. If the invention is considered of sufficient value to keep it secret, there is provision in this bill for the compensation of the inventor, and then when the application for the patent is finally granted and there is no further reason to keep it secret, the inventor would have the additional 17 years granted under the patent.

Mr. CHURCH. If the gentleman will yield, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOLMES] has the impression that the rights of the inventor are protected, but is it not a fact that just the opposite is the case? We discussed this matter in committee. The Government can take a man's invention and put it on a shelf and leave it there, under the terms of this bill, for 2 years.

Mr. LANHAM. I would say to the gentleman in reply that the amendment that is placed in this bill gives the inventor advantages he has never had before. Heretofore he has been paid only when the invention was used. According to the terms of this bill, the War and Navy Departments are authorized to agree with him upon compensation during the time it is withheld. Therefore, the inventor has advantages under this bill and is encouraged to make inventions in the interest of the national defense.

Mr. CHURCH. Will the gentleman point out to me the language in this final bill, H. R. 10058, whereby if an inventor's idea is not used by the Government he at any time gets paid for his invention?

Mr. LANHAM. He gets it in the proviso on page 2, beginning in line 16, which reads as follows:

Provided, That the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy or the chief officer of any established defense agency of the United States, as the case may be, is authorized to enter into an agreement with the said applicant in full settlement and compromise for the damage accruing to him by reason of the order of secrecy, and for the use of the invention by the Government.

Mr. CHURCH. In other words, there is merely authority in this bill for the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War to enter into agreement with him, but this bill gives the Patent Commissioner and the Secretaries of the Navy and of War the power to shelve the invention for a period of 2 years. It is because of the far-reaching effect of this bill that I am opposed to its passage by unanimous consent on this calendar, and the gentleman is acquainted with my feeling in the matter.

Mr. LANHAM. Quite so.

Mr. CHURCH. This is very important legislation. I think that perhaps such a bill should be worked out, but, although I have the utmost respect for the gentleman's motives, I may say that this is just one of those measures which prove that Congress should remain in session and give more thorough consideration to measures of this kind. The first few lines of this bill are very far-reaching:

Whenever the publication or disclosure of an invention by the granting of a patent might, in the opinion of the Commissioner of Patents, be detrimental to the public safety or defense, he may order that the invention be kept secret and withhold the grant of a patent for such period or periods as in his opinion the national interest requires.

Why, in Europe they protect every incentive of the inventor to invent and perfect his invention. I am very interested in carrying out the purpose of the gentleman's bill, but this bill is very far reaching and undertakes to apply a new principle, that of applying wartime measures to peacetime. That is exactly what it does. It should be considered when amendments may be considered and full discussion had.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CHURCH. I object, Mr. Speaker.

INTERFERENCE WITH DISCIPLINE OF THE ARMY, NAVY, AND COAST GUARD, DEPORTATION OF CERTAIN CLASSES OF ALIENS, FINGERPRINTING OF ALIENS, ETC.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 5138) to make unlawful attempts to interfere with the discipline of the Army, the Navy, and the Coast Guard; to require the deportation of certain classes of aliens; to require the fingerprinting of aliens seeking to enter the United States, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. SUMNERS of Texas, HOBBS, and HANCOCK.

AUTHORIZING COUNTY OF LAWRENCE, STATE OF OHIO, TO ACQUIRE AND OPERATE AS A UNIT CERTAIN PRIVATELY OWNED TOLL BRIDGES ACROSS THE OHIO RIVER ADJOINING SUCH COUNTY

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9920) authorizing the county of Lawrence, Ohio, to acquire and operate as a unit certain privately owned toll bridges across the Ohio River adjoining such county.

The clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the county of Lawrence, Ohio, or any duly organized bridge commission of such county, is authorized to acquire all right, title, and interest in any privately owned highway toll bridge across the Ohio River at any point within or adjoining such county, including the approaches thereto, and all interest in real property necessary therefor, by purchase, or by condemnation in accordance with the laws of the State of Ohio governing the acquisition of privately owned bridges by public authority.

SEC. 2. Jurisdiction of all condemnation proceedings under this act is hereby conferred upon the United States District Court for the Southern District of Ohio, and for such purpose the process of such court may be served outside of the State or district in which such court is located. Such proceedings shall follow, as near as may be, the law of the State of Ohio governing procedure in such condemnation cases. Copies of any final judgment or decree of such court in any such condemnation proceeding relating to land located outside the district in which such court is located shall be filed with the clerk of the court of the district in which such land is located.

SEC. 3. Any bridge acquired pursuant to this act shall be operated as a toll bridge and shall be grouped with any other bridge so acquired for financing purposes. The rate of toll of any such bridge shall be so adjusted as to provide, together with the tolls from all other bridges acquired pursuant to this act, (a) a sinking fund sufficient to amortize as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period not exceeding 25 years from the date of the issuance of bridge revenue bonds to finance the acquisition of bridges under this act, the principal, interest, financing cost, and redemption premium, if any, of all such bonds, and (b) a fund sufficient to pay the reasonable cost of maintaining, operating, and repairing such bridges under economical management during such period. After the fund provided in clause (a) shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of toll. An accurate record of the amount of bonds issued in the acquisition of such bridge, the financing costs thereof, the interest and redemption premiums payable thereon, the actual expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating such bridges, and of the daily tolls collected shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 4. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 2, after the word "authority", insert "and to maintain and operate said bridges in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters,' approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in that act."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS OHIO RIVER NEAR SHAWNEETOWN, ILL.

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9509) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Shawneetown, Ill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Shawneetown, Ill., authorized to be built by the county of Gallatin, State of Illinois, by an act of Congress approved July 18, 1939, is hereby extended 1 and 3 years, respectively, from July 18, 1940.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT OF ACT OF AUGUST 27, 1935, WITH RESPECT TO ADDITIONAL CLAIMS FILED BY INDIANS

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 811, the bill (S. 3352) to amend the act of August 27, 1935 (49 Stat. 2194), and for other purposes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the purpose of this bill?

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill for the Chippewa Indians, to which I objected at the time it was up for consideration because it apparently involved a large amount of money. However, I have been informed it involves not more than $5,000 and arises out of the Minnesota fire claims, and for this reason I told the gentleman from Oklahoma I would withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of August 27, 1935 (49 Stat. 2194), be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to allow the submission of claims by Indians thereunder at any time prior to June 30, 1941. The Comptroller General of the United States is directed to receive and settle any additional claims filed by Indians before said date and to reconsider all such claims which have been heretofore disallowed on account of failure to file them within the period of 2 years imposed by the act.

SEC. 2. Irrespective of the date of death or the sum involved or any contrary rule or practice with respect to payments of the claims, all amounts found due deceased Indians whose heirs have been determined by the Secretary of the Interior shall be paid to the appropriate superintendent or other bonded officer of the Indian Service for the benefit of the heirs, to be handled and accounted for by him with other moneys under his control in accordance with existing law and regulations. The amounts due deceased claimants whose heirs have not been thus determined shall be so paid upon applications therefor filed by the superintendent, for credit to the estates.

SEC. 3. The superintendent of the Consolidated Chippewa Agency is hereby authorized to file claims for any and all claimants or heirs of claimants whose whereabouts cannot be determined after due and diligent search, and a verified certificate filed by the superintendent that such due and diligent search has been made, shall be sufficient condition precedent to the right to file any such claim.

SEC. 4. Claims filed hereunder may be sworn to before a local postmaster or a superintendent or other officer of the Indian Service authorized to administer oaths.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EFFECTIVE USE OF PUBLIC DOMAIN

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I find that in the bill H. R. 9705 (Calendar No. 839), passed a few moments ago, there is a typographical error on page 20, line 17, wherein the bill refers to section 3, when it should refer to section 1. I ask unanimous consent that that correction may be made in the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DISPOSITION OF CERTAIN RECORDS, UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10026) to provide for the disposition of certain photographed records of the United States Government, and for other purposes, which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Will the gentleman please explain the bill?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, this bill seeks to facilitate the disposition of certain original records of the Government of the United States, which records have been photographed, and multifilmed; and the photographic and multifilmed copies have been placed in conveniently accessible files, and provision made for their preservation, examination, and use. The bill, by all of the statements of the various departments, will save $1,000,000 a year in filing. Four hundred thousand dollars alone will be saved in W. P. A. by their own statement.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. If this bill should become law, what will become of the old original records? Will some fellow be able to make a lot of money buying and selling some old original records which might be of considerable value because of their age?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Those records will be kept in the archives, as they are at present.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Original records?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes. I may say that the W. P. A. alone has thousands of records filed away, which they anticipate they may need numerous copies of at a later date. By photographing one single copy or filming it, it can be set aside and preserved indefinitely, and many additional copies could be had without the setting up of additional facilities to care for them.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I understood that the gentleman is going to have photostatic copies of these records made for the permanent record and that the originals were to be destroyed. Did I misunderstand the gentleman?

Mr. ELLIOTT. This has nothing to do with the records; they are already on file in the Archives Building. These are for new records filed from day to day.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. They will not include any of the old records going back a hundred years or so?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Oh, no; it has nothing to do with that. If we did, they would be very much better off. If we could keep them in the shape of a film instead of in a paper volume they would be better off, because the film would not deteriorate while the paper would.

Mr. KRAMER. And did I understand the gentleman to say that there would be a tremendous saving if this bill is agreed to?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes. I sent out copies of the bill to each Department, and I have been assured that this bill will save a million dollars a year to the Government. The gentleman from California [Mr. GEARHART] and myself went through this list, and if the gentlemen are interested in saving a million dollars a year in filing they ought to accept this bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I congratulate the gentleman's committee on making a saving. It is the first committee that I have heard of doing that this year.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Has this bill the approval of the Bureau of the Budget?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I am very glad that at last, when Uncle Sam's Treasury is almost bankrupt, the New Deal shows some little interest in saving a few dollars for our overburdened taxpayers. Therefore, I shall not object to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. ELLIOTT. The other member of the committee—and they call it the wastepaper-basket committee—and I went over the matter thoroughly and we have been assured that it would save a million dollars a year.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever any agency of the United States Government shall have photographed or microphotographed all or any part of the records kept by or in the agency, and whenever such photographs or microphotographs shall be placed in conveniently accessible files and provision made for preserving, examining, and using the same, the head of such agency may, with the approval of the Archivist of the United States, cause the original records from which the photographs or microphotographs have been made or any part thereof to be disposed of according to methods prescribed by law, provided records of the same specific kind in the particular agency have been previously authorized for disposition by Congress.

SEC. 2. Photographs or microphotographs of any record photographed or microphotographed as herein provided shall have the same force and effect as the originals thereof would have had, and shall be treated as originals for the purpose of their admissibility in evidence. Duly certified or authenticated copies of such photographs or microphotographs shall be admitted in evidence equally with the original photographs or microphotographs.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, after the word "agency", in line 5, insert, "in a manner and on film that complies with the minimum standards of quality approved for permanent photographic records by the National Bureau of Standards."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

DELIVERY OF CERTAIN FIRST-CLASS MAIL MATTER

Mr. MOSER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOSER. Mr. Speaker, in the consideration of the bill S. 3667, to provide for the 2-cent local delivery rate of postage on certain first-class mail matter, I objected, and opportunity having been denied me to voice my opposition thereto, because it is legislation to wipe out a tax of 1 cent within the corporate confines of a city, and continue it necessary for the rest of the United States to pay a 3-cent postage rate to handle and deliver a first-class letter from one town across a river 100 yards wide, and make it possible to deliver first-class mail from New York City and County proper across the East River into Queens County and Brooklyn, New York. I object, because it is a rank discrimination.

Mr. Speaker, the Constitution of the United States, section 8, provides as follows:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Mr. Speaker, having devoted nearly a quarter of a century of my life to the postal service of the United States, I may be considered somewhat qualified to speak on this subject. My colleague and friend the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], has again referred to the 3-cent postage rate on first-class mail as the creation of the Democratic Party as on previous occasions. As heretofore I would remind him that the extra 1 cent added to the regular "2 cents per ounce or fraction thereof" legal rate for first-class mail under the law, is a tax levied on first-class mail and approved by a Republican President of the United States, under its advocacy by a Postmaster General selected by this same Republican President and nominated for the position to which he was confirmed by a Republican Senate.

This Postmaster General, Walter Folger Brown, during the administration of President Hoover, advocated the increased rate on first-class postage rates, and I quote from the Literary Digest, October 24, 1931, which article captioned "Is the Two-Cent Stamp Doomed?" in which former Postmaster General Brown is quoted from the New York Times and carries other pertinent observations on the subject and quotations from other publications and editors, as follows:

IS THE 2-CENT STAMP DOOMED?

The biggest business organization in the world is "in the red."

This organization is the United States Post Office, the Washington correspondents tell us.

If, in December, Congress acts on the recommendation of Postmaster General Walter Folger Brown, the 2-cent stamp will soon be supplanted by a new one of 2½ or 3 cents, to meet a deficit that now approaches $100,000,000 a year. As reported in the New York Times, Mr. Brown explains:

"A half-cent raise will bring in an additional $65,000,000 yearly, and with a 1-cent increase the deficit would be more than balanced by the extra $135,000,000.

"This would enable the Post Office Department to accomplish some other things we have in mind in this manufacturing and selling of stamps and postal service."

Though the United States Post Office Department has not paid its own way since about 1851, we read, its annual deficit in the last 5 years has been increasing by such leaps and bounds that now Postmaster General Brown contends that Congress ought to readjust postal rates and expenditures "to recover the entire cost of handling the post-office business from postal patrons, in proportion to the use which they make of post-office facilities."

Increased letter-postal rates to Canada and Great Britain went into effect on September 1, raising the old 2-cent rate to 3 cents across our northern border and 5 cents across the Atlantic. When other increases go into effect on November 1, the Philadelphia Inquirer reminds us, "practically all foreign destinations will be subject to the 5-cent rate, except the independent nations of Latin America. The Pan American Union will then be a postal union with a uniform letter rate on a 2-cent basis."

In 1930, notes the Boston Herald, this foreign mail comprised only 354,000,000 pieces out of a total of some 28,000,000,000.

But this business of handling mails "can no more be transformed into a money-making enterprise than a brook trout can be made to live in a cage"—so insists Representative Clyde Kelly (Republican Pennsylvania), of the House committee on postal affairs. Congressman Kelly has published a book on United States Postal Policy, in which he contends that it is perfectly logical that the Government should transport and deliver private mail for less than cost. In sharp opposition to Postmaster General Brown, Mr. Kelly asserts:

"No responsible American has ever agonized over postal deficit. That has always been a monopoly of postal officials who get no pleasure in contemplating the service given for a 2-cent stamp as the greatest value for the money in the world."

The prospect of the passing of the 2-cent stamp brings tears to the eyes, or at least the pens, of a number of editors. Almost sentimentally they quote the words of the Manchester (England) Guardian, moved by the boost in foreign rates, to mourn:

"There were always about the relations of this country and the States two strange and beautiful things:

"One is the Canadian frontier—3,000 miles of frontier without one defense work. The other is—soon we must say was—the reciprocal postage rate.

"Any Englishman could write to the States for the same penny half-penny that he would write to any part of England or the Empire itself.

"That mutual privilege was, one felt, something precious—of a worth not to be weighed in gold."

Loyal Republican organs like the New York Herald Tribune acquiesce in the Postmaster General's recommendation; but others, including the New Orleans Times-Picayune (independent Democratic), the Albany Knickerbocker Press (independent Republican), the Milwaukee Journal (independent), and the Birmingham News (independent), all agree that economies should not include the stamp boost. Calling attention to the fact that Mr. Brown proposes an increased rate for first-class mail only, "though first-class mail is the only branch of the Postal Service that pays its own way and more," the Washington News (independent) goes on to say:

"But first-class mail is also the one class of mail which meets no competition from private services.

"On letter mail the Government has a monopoly. The express companies fight for a share of all the other business handled.

"It is not proposed to raise the rates on second-, third-, and fourth-class mail, already carried at a loss. But letter mail, which produces 60 percent of the Post Office Department's annual revenues, is asked to carry the burden because for most of those who pay letter postage there is no escape."

Mr. Speaker, the Chamber of Commerce of the City of New York has inveighed against the 3-cent first-class postage rate and sought congressional enactment of legislation for the highly prejudiced relief in the interest of Greater New York, and this bill is the answer to their prayers.

Mr. Speaker, it was not long after the enactment of the Revenue Act of 1932, more especially section 1001, relating to first-class postage rates, until Mr. General Public became educated to the methods by which heavy mailers of first-class mail could avoid payment of the tax of an additional 1 cent, amounting to 50 percent. Lodges and clubs, and so forth, found it more economical to abandon the first-class sealed letter with the 2-cent stamp and used the unsealed postage-saver envelope. Electric-light, gas, and telephone companies found, in compact territory, they could deliver bills more economically than to mail them at the first-class rate plus the tax. Postal cards at 1 cent each for cost and the postage came into great favor, and the revenues anticipated by Postmaster General Brown fell way below the calculated amount. To recover as much of this lost business and revenue as possible became the problem of the Post Office Department.

Mr. Speaker, to catch the user of the postage-saver envelope the regulations were changed from the one-time 20 identical copies to 30 copies at a single mailing to secure advantage of the third-class rates of postage, were advanced to 200 identical copies, and the 1-cent embossed stamped envelope long sold by the Post Office Department became unmailable for this purpose unless with a regulatory legend of permissibility by reference to the specified section of the Postal Laws and Regulations are printed on the envelope sold with the stamp embossed thereon for the purpose. The Post Office Department was hard pressed to find a way of making it inconvenient and unpopular to use its own most economical service, thus seeking to discourage it. The further pinch of reduced revenues engendered the entirely unconstitutional administrative regulation of providing 2-cent first-class rates for local delivery within the office of mailing.

Mr. Speaker, when I was a post-office inspector in Chicago it was claimed that Western Avenue, within that city's limits, extended 38 miles in length; the extent to which additional communities and extended City Delivery Service since then is not known, but calculated considerable. This administrative action in the lifting of a tax imposed under the Revenue Act of 1932 from first-class postage rates effected a condition where a patron of the office at one extreme end of the avenue could have a letter delivered for 2 cents to a resident at the extreme opposite end of the delivery service. The same situation would apply in New York City within the confines of the delivery service of the post office. A letter collected from a street box at the Battery would pass through the Station P collection service and be canceled and then transported through New York City post-office facilities and be delivered through Kings Bridge Station or beyond as far as extended since I studied that city's distribution system.

Contrasted to this removal and effacement of this tax imposed under the Revenue Act of 1932 is the example in the district that I represent. The boroughs of Hamburg and West Hamburg, and Leesport and West Leesport are separated by the Schuylkill River, about 100 yards wide at these points, but first-class postage rates between these places bear the 50-percent tax that has been removed for local delivery within the area served by a single post office.

Mr. Speaker, this bill S. 3667 is discriminatory in its provisions and is the answer to the prayers of the New York Chamber of Commerce in that it would further violate the constitutional restrictions on Congress in further removing uniformity of a tax otherwise applied "throughout the United States." It removes "such additional (tax) rate to first-class matter mailed for local delivery wholly within a county the population of which exceeds 1,000,000, provided said county is entirely within a corporate city." That means delivery across the East River to take in Brooklyn, N. Y. It is discriminatory and affects no other spot in the United States.

Mr. Speaker, there is another matter to be considered. High officials of the Post Office Department have repeatedly assured postal employees there will be no reduction in salaries if the present rate of first-class postage continues. Postal employees are therefore effective lobbyists with Members of Congress to maintain this increased rate of first-class postage, even though it is a tax under the Revenue Act of 1932. With this assurance on the part of officials of the Post Office Department, I can only come to one conclusion as to the reaction on the part of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARRY] if the elimination of this tax on the first-class postage rates for New York City and Brooklyn, N. Y., were to be taken literally at the word of the officials of the Post Office Department, and postal salaries were to be reduced in those cities commensurate to the loss of revenue, which must be borne by the other taxpayers of the Nation.

AMENDING SECTION 301 (A) OF THE SUGAR ACT OF 1937

Mr. DEROUEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 3237), to amend section 301 (a) of the Sugar Act of 1937.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-three Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. DEROUEN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 153]

Allen, Pa.	Drewry	Mansfield	Seger
Anderson, Mo.	Flaherty	Marcantonio	Shafer, Mich.
Andrews	Flannery	Massingale	Shanley
Bates, Mass.	Gamble	Merritt	Sheridan
Bradley, Pa.	Green	Mitchell	Smith, Maine
Brewster	Halleck	Monroney	Smith, Wash.
Brown, Ohio	Hawks	Norton	Smith, W. Va.
Burdick	Jenkins, Ohio	Oliver	Somers, N.Y.
Burgin	Jennings	Pace	Sullivan
Byron	Johns	Pfeifer	Sumners, Tex.
Casey, Mass.	Keefe	Reed, N. Y.	Tenerowicz
Chapman	Keller	Risk	Thomas, N. J.
Cooley	Kirwan	Romjue	Thomas, Tex.
Crowther	Lemke	Routzohn	Vinson, Ga.
Darrow	Lynch	Sabath	Voorhis, Calif.
Dickstein	McArdle	Sandager	White, Ohio
Dingell	McGranery	Schuetz	Wolcott
Disney	McLean	Schwert	Wood

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and sixty-two Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

By unanimous consent, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subsection (a) of section 301 of the Sugar Act of 1937 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "The Secretary is authorized to make payments, notwithstanding a failure to comply with the conditions provided in this subsection, but the payments made with respect to any crop shall be subject to a deduction of $10 for each child for each day, or a portion of a day, during which such child was employed or permitted to work contrary to the foregoing provisions of this subsection, in the 1937, 1938, and 1939 crops."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded on the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DEROUEN]?

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. DEROUEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana is recognized.

Mr. DEROUEN. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration is Senate bill 3237, which has to do with an amendment to section 301 (a) of the Sugar Act of 1937.

The planters, in employing children in Louisiana, I mean boys under 14 or 15 years of age, have been penalized under this act. The law permits them to be employed over 14 years of age. There were a few farmers who employed children for a week or 10 days or 2 days who were under that age. I cite one case. There were employed 77 people and there were only 2 children under the age of 14. They took every precaution not to violate the law. We have never abused child labor in that area of Louisiana. We are very jealous of supporting child labor.

We took this precaution, that when they presented themselves, 40 or 50 or 60 at a time, we asked them their ages. They were made to sign an affidavit, a declaration that they were over that age. In addition to that, we have their parent or guardian, their uncle or someone in the family subscribe to that declaration or that affidavit. When the overseer or manager of a farm would find out they were under age they were immediately discharged. Fifty-four farmers were involved. Some of them were on the border line, and after investigation they were passed by, and there remains 43 of them for the years 1937, 1938, and 1939 whose benefit payments are withheld by the Secretary of Agriculture. This has been investigated thoroughly. It has the recommendation of the Department of Agriculture. It has the support and approval of the National Child Labor Committee. It has the support of labor organizations, as far as I know. I feel these farmers are justly entitled to be paid. They are conforming with every regulation.

Some of these men have $1,000 or $2,000 benefit payments that are held up. They have five or six children and they have had to take them out of school and college on account of this, and in addition they have mortgages on their farms. It is recommended that these cases are meritorious and they should be paid.

Mr. Speaker, the amendment which is now proposed to the Sugar Act is recommended by the Secretary of Agriculture for the purpose of straightening out a situation in which the language of the law is so strict that it has created administrative problems which can only be cured by an act of Congress.

Let me explain the difficulties. The Sugar Act requires that farmers who grow sugarcane and sugar beets comply with five conditions before they can become eligible for payments from the Department of Agriculture. These payments are financed by the sugar industry through a tax on sugar, and the amount collected from that tax each year is about $20,000,000 in excess of the amount paid out to farmers. The five conditions of compliance include acreage restrictions, soil-conserving practices, fair prices for sugarcane or sugar beets, a minimum-wage scale for labor in the fields, and also a prohibition against children being employed. In all of the cases involved the first four conditions have been complied with, but there have been technical violations in a few cases where boys, who had every appearance of being above the required age and who misrepresented their ages, were employed or permitted to work for 1 or 2 days. In every case which I know of the boy was discharged immediately upon a doubt being raised as to his age, even though in all cases he claimed to be over-age and had the appearance of mature growth.

As all of you know, the Sugar Act is the only law which fixes the wages of agricultural workers, and the growers of my State have paid the higher wages required. It is also a fact that the Sugar Act is the only law which prohibits children from performing agricultural work on the farm. This is something new and, like all new laws, it took a while for the farmers to make adjustments to guard against unintentional infractions.

Now, let me emphasize that this is not a proposal to change the law for the future. It is merely an amendment by which those farmers who were the victims of misrepresentation or inadvertence, as the Secretary of Agriculture himself states, may be allowed to participate in the program through the payment of a penalty of $10 per day per child. Under the provisions of section 301 of the Sugar Act, the growers have been deprived of the full payments due to them for the 1937, 1938, and 1939 crops. It is quite obvious Congress never intended that such an exaggerated and excessive penalty would ever be applied in technical cases, and yet the law is so strictly worded that the Secretary of Agriculture is without discretion. The amendment which we advocate fits the penalty to the offense but still does not excuse any farmer no matter how technical his so-called violation may have been.

The amendment which we now offer first received the unanimous approval of the Senate Committee on Agriculture after the Secretary of Agriculture had submitted a letter approving the change and recommending certain language, which has been adopted as written by the Department of Agriculture. The Senate then considered the matter and again it was passed unanimously; next the House Committee on Agriculture, after considering the proposal, likewise gave its unanimous approval and recommended to the House the adoption of the amendment. The Rules Committee now submits a special rule for its consideration.

In addition to the approval of the Department of Agriculture, I am pleased to announce that the National Child Labor Committee has looked into this proposal very carefully and after a complete study of the matter, the chairman has written a letter stating that they have no objection to the correction proposed in this amendment.

Mr. Speaker, let me stress again that for the purposes of the 1940 crop and for future years, if the law continues in effect, there will be no change made whatsoever in the requirements as to child labor. The amendment which is now under consideration will have the effect of clearing cases with respect to the 1937, 1938, and 1939 crops, but even in those cases it does not remove all penalties but fixes the penalties on a basis which is more in keeping with other child-labor laws of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I speak with experience as a sugarcane grower for 50 years when I say that the sugarcane growers of Louisiana have gone through a great many hardships in order to comply with the strict regulations of the Department of Agriculture, and I am sure that everyone will see the justice of this claim which is based upon such extraordinary circumstances that it would be an injustice to deprive these farmers of their entire payments, simply because they had inadvertently or because of misrepresentation made to them technically violated one out of five conditions required to be eligible for payments. To show that there was no intention whatsoever to exploit children or to take advantage of child labor, the wages paid to the boys permitted to work for a day or two were at the wage scale for adults, as required by the regulations of the Department of Agriculture. If they paid an adult's wage, they expected to get the results of the work of a full-grown man. This definitely shows that there was no improper motive or intent to avoid child-labor regulations. In no case was there any employment of a group of children, but in every case which I know of the farmer who is being deprived of his payment had employed or permitted to work one overgrown boy for 1 or 2 days. These farmers are law-abiding citizens who deserve the relief which the Department of Agriculture has recommended when giving its approval to the amendment before us.

Mr. Speaker, under the Sugar Act of 1937, title IV, sections 401 to 406, inclusive, a tax of one-half cent per pound is levied on sugar consumed in the United States. This tax annually provides revenue of $66,000,000 to $73,000,000. The purpose of this sugar tax is to raise funds with which to finance the sugar program, including payments to growers of sugarcane and sugar beets. Each year the total cost of the sugar program has been at least $20,000,000 less than the total tax revenue, which means that the United States Treasury benefits upward of $20,000,000 annually.

In the appropriation bill for the Department of Agriculture each year an appropriation is made to cover all costs of the sugar program, including payments to farmers. Congress in 1938 made available funds with which to pay farmers on the 1937 crop. In 1939 Congress appropriated funds to make payments on the 1938 crop; this year funds have been made available to make payments on the 1939 crop, and the appropriation for the 1940 crop will be made available through similar appropriations. Therefore, all funds used for payments to farmers based upon the 1937, 1938, and 1939 crops have already been appropriated by Congress for this specific purpose and the money has been collected into the United States Treasury by means of the tax on sugar.

According to table 24, page 42, of the official report of the United States Tariff Commission dated March 1940 and entitled "Statistics on Sugar," the Federal sugar revenues and disbursements under the sugar program have been as follows:

Year	Internal-revenue taxes		Net tax revenue
	Gross collections [1]	A. A. S. sugar payments [2]
1934	$33,887,000	$56,000	$33,831,000
1935	66,440,000	57,015,000	9,425,000
1936	1,295,000	28,000,000	−26,705,000
1937	4,272,000	2,336,000	1,936,000
1938	66,368,000	29,730,000	36,638,000
1939	73,233,000	51,324,000	21,909,000

Sugars of other polariscopic test were taxed proportionally. These taxes were discontinued following the decision of the Supreme Court on Jan. 6, 1936, that the processing-tax provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act were unconstitutional. The Sugar Act of 1937, effective Sept. 1, 1937, imposes an excise tax on manufactured sugar produced in the United States and an import compensating tax on manufactured sugar imported into the United States. The rate of tax is one-half cent per pound on 96° sugar, and sugars of other polariscopic test are taxed proportionally. Source: U. S. Bureau of Internal Revenue.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the preponderance of evidence submitted to the House this afternoon clearly indicates the fairness and justice of the enactment of this legislation in order that these sugar farmers might be paid the benefit payments justly due and owing them.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. COFFEE], who reported this bill.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, this bill was reported by the Senate unanimously. It came out of our Committee on Agriculture unanimously, and in order that you may know just what it is, let me read it to you. It is a very short amendment to the child-labor section of the Sugar Act of 1937:

That subsection (a) of section 301 of the Sugar Act of 1937 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "The Secretary is authorized to make payments, notwithstanding a failure to comply with the conditions provided in this subsection, but the payments made with respect to any crop shall be subject to a deduction of $10 for each child for each day, or a portion of a day, during which such child was employed or permitted to work contrary to the foregoing provisions of this subsection, in the 1937, 1938, and 1939 crops."

Mr. Speaker, this bill has been made necessary by virtue of the fact that our present sugar law provides a too severe penalty for child-labor violations. The sugar-beet or sugar-cane grower, who inadvertently violates the child-labor section of that act, would have his entire sugar benefit payments held up.

In many instances in Louisiana, I understand, there are payments of $50,000 or more held up because some child under age was employed for several days, although that child may have lied about his age when he got the job. Nevertheless, the law is such that the Secretary of Agriculture is unable to make these payments to the growers, even though they have complied with every other condition of the law. If they employed a child under age for 1 day the entire payment is held up. Consequently, in the interest of justice and equity, this bill provides that these payments may be paid, but that the penalty for violation shall be $10 per day for each day for each child that worked on the 1937, 1938, and 1939 crops. It does not apply to the 1940 crop. When this sugar legislation went into effect, many growers were not familiar with the provisions of the law. Let me read a letter which I received from Courtenay Dinwiddie, general secretary of the National Child Labor Committee, which committee was incorporated by act of Congress in 1907:

Mr. Dinwiddie writes me as follows:

NATIONAL CHILD LABOR COMMITTEE.
New York City, May 16, 1940.

Hon. HARRY B. COFFEE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN COFFEE: The National Child Labor Committee favors the passage of S. 3237 as revised by the Senate and approved by the House Committee on Agriculture and now on the House Calendar. We believe that the loss of the entire sugar subsidy by a grower because of a minor infraction of the child-labor provisions of the Sugar Act of 1937 may easily work a hardship, and that S. 3237 now before the House would provide a reasonable remedy. We have taken this position on the bill in the light of assurance from Hon. MARVIN JONES that it does not waive or abrogate penalties for violations of the child-labor provisions of the Sugar Act of 1937 with respect to the 1940 crop and in the light of your own assurance that the discussion of this point on the floor of the Senate, when S. 3237 was agreed to, is a guarantee that the bill does not have the effect of abrogating any penalties with respect to the 1940 crop.

Sincerely yours,

COURTENAY DINWIDDIE,
General Secretary.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DEROUEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, let me say that so far as I know there have been no violations of the child-labor sections in the sugar-beet areas in Nebraska, and very few, if any, in any of the sugar-beet areas. This bill applies primarily to the Louisiana situation. I feel that as a matter of equity this House should pass this bill, and it should be passed almost unanimously.

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. I yield.

Mr. HORTON. Is there anything at all showing that any growers have willfully violated the child-labor provisions of the act?

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. No. I want to say there is no evidence to my knowledge showing that any of the growers have willfully violated the Child Labor Act. The Secretary of Agriculture has recommended the passage of this bill.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. The gentleman said that the violations of the child-labor provisions have been inadvertent. There is nothing in the bill but inadvertence. If they were inadvertent had we not better scrap all child-labor legislation and start anew? If we have laws against child labor how can we expect to enforce them if we forgive the penalties when violators claim inadvertence? It is very easy to claim that.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. I think the gentlewoman from Massachusetts is unduly alarmed. I feel that when the Congress finds it has provided a penalty that is entirely too severe, in the interest of maintaining child-labor legislation, the penalty should be rewritten to more nearly provide the proper penalty, such as is being done in this bill.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. But you are saying after the violation that there shall be no punishment. Why does this not set a precedent that when penal laws are violated the penalty is lifted retroactively?

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. If I may answer the gentlewoman from Massachusetts, a penalty provision is contained in this bill. The grower is penalized to the extent of $10 per day per child for every day the under-age child was permitted to work.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. I yield.

Mr. REES of Kansas. I think the gentleman said that about $50,000 is involved in payments withheld. How many growers would this affect?

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. I do not know how many growers or how much money is involved. In Louisiana there are large plantations, and more than $50,000 is involved in several of the pending cases.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. As I understand it, organized labor, which is always protecting child labor, favors the enactment of this legislation.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. I cannot say as to that, but I do know that the National Child Labor Committee approves and recommends the passage of this bill.

Mr. MICHENER. I understood the chairman of the committee to say that the statement I made was correct.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, there is no question of policy involved in this bill either as to agriculture or child labor; it is simply a matter of adjusting a penalty which appears to be unusually severe to most of us who have looked into the matter. It is true that in some cases large sums of money are involved. This is because the mere employment for 1 day of a child under the age provided in the law might compel a producer to forfeit all of his Government payment. That payment, however, is not a gratuity given to him, it is a payment which comes out of his own pocket, because it is paid out of a tax that he pays himself. It seems to me that in the bill we are discussing there is a sufficient penalty for an inadvertent violation of the law—and this applies only to inadvertent violations—that is a payment of $10 per day for every child for every day the child was employed. I do not think a penalty of this kind will lend any encouragement to the employment of child labor. I hope therefore that in justice to those who have suffered these severe penalties this legislation will be enacted.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 8 minutes to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS].

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to speak on the position of organized labor regarding this violation of the child-labor provisions of the act. On May 28, 1940, the newspaper, Labor, carried an editorial headed "Block Bill To Exploit Kiddies." The article is as follows:

BLOCK BILL TO EXPLOIT KIDDIES

Legislation criticized by opponents as designed to permit the exploitation of children of tender years in sugar fields was blocked in the House this week when an effort was made to bring it up under unanimous consent.

Its supporters immediately went before the reactionary Rules Committee and obtained a special rule for its consideration.

Congresswoman EDITH NOURSE ROGERS (Republican, Massachusetts) is leading the fight against the proposal, insisting its passage would be a national disgrace.

Under the Costigan-Jones Sugar Control Act, providing subsidies for the sugar industry, the employment of children under 14 is forbidden. Planters who violate this provision lose their claim to Government benefits.

The Department of Agriculture is holding up a number of checks because of violations, one being for $240,000 which a Louisiana planter cannot get because he employed 10-year-old children in the cane fields.

Legislation which a planters' lobby quietly slipped through the Senate and is trying to get through the House directs the Department of Agriculture to turn the checks loose and let offenders off with a fine of $10.

"It is unconscionable," Mrs. ROGERS said, "to use our Government's money to reward the sugar-plantation owners who violated the law.

"The report on this bill is an ironic paradox. It says that children were employed by planters under an inadvertence. If it is merely inadvertent to employ a 10-year-old child instead of an unemployed man or woman, then we should frankly repeal all child-labor laws.

"Either we must deny benefits under the Sugar Act to any Simon Legree who employs children under 14 or we should, in common decency, and as an act of public honesty, frankly admit that we condone the employment of children by sugar growers."

Such organizations as the National Congress of Parents and Teachers and the Young Women's Christian Association petitioned the Speaker of the House for a public hearing before it was considered. I have received numerous letters and telegrams protesting against this amendment. Hearings were not granted and the legislation has been railroaded through every committee. Now there is an attempt to railroad it through the House.

Mr. Dinwiddie, of the National Child Labor Committee, has never answered the letter I wrote to him in which I told him I was amazed that he should ask the Members of Congress to vote for this bill which condoned violations of the child-labor laws. In other letters he had asked me to protect child labor from exploitation.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I will yield in just a minute.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to state to the House that two of these violators would receive payments in the neighborhood of $250,544; and also that in asking someone about it, I was told that one of these employers claimed he had only allowed a child to work for 1 day. It is a pretty good business proposition, is it not, for him to secure nearly $200,000 by paying a fine of only $10? Over a million dollars are involved in payments out of the Treasury in this bill—money due the Government in payment by sugar growers for admitted violations of the Sugar Act. The passage of this amendment will be a costly procedure for the Federal Treasury. No other group of violators of legislation passed by the Congress has ever been granted such exemptions. These Louisiana sugar violators of our laws have asked to be put in a highly privileged class.

There seems to be some power that these two largest violators of the law exert, as they are the ones so often spoken of. There is something very queer about this, because if a man pays $10 a day per child as a fine he will then receive some $180,000. In other child-labor acts, if the laws are violated by the employer, in every instance, so far as I know, the employer has been obliged to pay the full penalty required by law. There is something very mysterious about this amendment. This exacts full payment in 1940 if a man should violate the law, but allows the man—retroactively for 3 years, 1937, 1938, 1939—who has violated the act to escape with only a very small fine. I do not feel these employers employed children under 14 years of age inadvertently. We have a tremendous labor market today, a tremendous number of unemployed, men who are able to work in the sugar fields and who can stand the work in the hot sun. I asked one man why older persons were not employed. He replied that they can stand it. Think of employing children in that work. Little children under 14 do not grow properly if they are forced to do hard labor; they cannot stand labor out in that hot sun in the sugarcane fields.

I wrote to the chairman of the Rules Committee and asked to be heard when the bill was brought before the Rules Committee in order to protect little boys and girls and to prevent child labor and it is the only time in all my 16 years of experience in Congress when I asked for a hearing that the Rules Committee did not grant me a hearing. The bill was railroaded through the Senate, apparently without hearings, anyway without a report. It was reported by the House Committee on Agriculture, and in talking with Members on the floor here I am very sure they do not understand the provisions of the bill. I do not believe for a minute that Members here are willing to make a mockery of the Child Labor Act. If this amendment be adopted it will be a terrible blow on the child-labor record of this administration that has claimed to champion child labor.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONNERY. I would like to call to the gentlewoman's attention the fact that the words "inadvertent violator," which we have heard so many times here today, appears nowhere in this bill. Every single violator could claim that the violation was inadvertent, and no doubt many have done so even though their violations were deliberate and intentional.

Furthermore, a statement was made that this bill involves only $50,000 when, as a matter of fact, the amount involved is well over a million dollars. In fact, I have it right here in this report from the Sugar Division of the Department of Commerce that in one instance two sugar producers who are violators will split $255,000 or more.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. The gentleman is absolutely correct. He is a great adviser against child labor—against the exploitation of little children. Apparently the growers admit they have violated the law, yet they ask that they be allowed to receive their full payments minus $10 per day per child for violations, which is practically nothing in the way of a fine. It is very bad for the legislative honor of Members of Congress if they sanction this type of legislation. If we pass this bill today, we are saying, in effect, to persons who violate the law, no matter what kind of law it may be, "You can go ahead and violate the law and later Congress will very obligingly forgive you if you pay $10, or some small sum. Then you can go ahead and violate it." This is very bad procedure. This would be a very bad precedent to establish.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. I want to correct a statement that has been made. It has been stated here that only $50,000 is involved. I do not know how much is involved. I know that in some cases it is more than $50,000, but I have had no letters from anyone in reference to the total amount.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I understand there are no violators in the gentleman's State. So far as the beet-sugar growers are concerned, there are practically no violators. The following is the list of violators sent to me by Dr. Bernhardt, of the Department of Agriculture.

Sugarcane and sugar-beet producers involved in investigation of alleged noncompliance with the child-labor provisions of the Sugar Act of 1937, classified according to amount of conditional payments

Payment intervals and area	Number of producers involved	Amount of payments
MAINLAND CANE AREA
Total [1]	39	$514,354.04
Under $500	1	248.24
$500 to $1,000	4	2,685.55
$1,000 to $2,500	12	18,951.86
$2,500 to $5,000	5	16,528.34
$5,000 to $10,000	7	54,763.79
$10,000 to $25,000	5	80,364.17
$25,000 to $50,000	3	90,267.82
$50,000 to $175,000	2	250,544.27
DOMESTIC BEET AREA
Total [2]	33	6,302.82
Under $100	5	441.70
$100 to $150	11	1,305.73
$150 to $200	5	863.67
$200 to $300	6	1,438.05
$300 to $400	4	1,382.35
$400 to $500	2	871.32

[1] In addition to the foregoing, a payment of about $220,000 has been deferred in 1 case on the 1938 crop as an "offset" pending final determination with respect to a disputed minor instance of alleged noncompliance in the 1937 crop.

[2] Data on the amount of conditional payments are not available in Washington for approximately 150 additional possible noncompliance cases in sugar-beet areas, since their payment records are in the field offices.

There are more cases than are listed here among the cane-sugar-grower violators at the present time which are being investigated. This is a very cruel piece of legislation and very far reaching.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. In view of the fact the gentlewoman has found a case involving $250,000, does the gentlewoman consider that is a just penalty to impose upon anyone in the event he violated the provisions of the law, even though it might have been through inadvertence?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Of course, the grower can appeal to the courts or the grower can secure the passage of a private bill. If you pass this measure, you are passing an omnibus claims bill in effect involving over a million dollars. Each claim should be considered on its merits. This is a very unwise piece of legislation. I am surprised that the gentleman from Nebraska and others have not informed themselves regarding the number of violators and the amounts involved.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentlewoman will agree, and I think every Member of this House will agree, that at the time section 301 (a) was placed in this act, it was done for the purpose of guarding against child-labor employment. Here we have cases where violators have admitted they violated the law and still have the audacity to ask compensation and forgiveness.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Yes; but apparently they do not ask forgiveness; they demand payment. They do not pretend it is an inadvertence. They admit they violated the law, then say it makes no difference and they must be paid. This is very pernicious legislation. It is very unfortunate that it is brought up under suspension without a chance to explain it fully or to amend it. It is "gag" procedure; only 10 minutes' time is given to the opposition.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. At the time these children were hired did the growers know they were hiring children who were not supposed to be hired?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. They knew the law, of course. They could have easily found out. If they violate the law in the State of Massachusetts they have to pay the penalty, as they do in the State of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. COFFEE]. There are no extenuating circumstances for inadvertence. The growers in Louisiana are intelligent enough and they must have known they would have to pay a fine if they employed children under 14. The penalty was such that they should take precautionary measures not to violate the law; but they took that chance, feeling they would be protected.

To show that the original act was perfectly fair, clear, and understandable, and was liberal to those farmers who wanted to employ their own children, I quote that section of the act:

(a) That no child under the age of 14 years shall have been employed or permitted to work on the farm, whether for gain to such child or any other person, in the production, cultivation, or harvesting of a crop of sugar beets or sugarcane with respect to which application for payment is made, except a member of the immediate family of a person who was the legal owner of not less than 40 percent of the crop at the time such work was performed; and that no child between the ages of 14 and 16 years shall have been employed or permitted to do such work, whether for gain to such child or any other person, for a longer period than 8 hours in any 1 day, except a member of the immediate family of a person who was the legal owner of not less than 40 percent of the crop at the time such work was performed.

The amendment is as follows:

The Secretary is authorized to make payments, notwithstanding a failure to comply with the conditions provided in this subsection, but the payments made with respect to any crop shall be subject to a deduction of $10 for each child for each day, or a portion of a day, during which such child was employed or permitted to work contrary to the foregoing provisions of this subsection, in the 1937, 1938, and 1939 crops.

Mr. RICH. I have known of cases where the parents swore to the age of the child.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Of course, the gentleman knows that it was the duty of the sugar grower to make sure he had not violated the law and to take no chances on that score.

Mr. RICH. I would like to know—I want some information as to whether the growers knowingly violated the law.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I made the following statement on the floor some time ago, I will say to the gentleman:

Section 301–A, however, expressly exempts the farmer who may wish to use his own child in planting or harvest time on his own farm. It seeks merely to outlaw the vicious padrone system, under which large groups of children are practically sold to a padrone or overseer, who "rents them out" for profit on these large plantations.

If they did not know, these overseers must have known and these overseers were employed by them. With the tremendous number of unemployed it must have been very easy to find many people over 14 to do the work in the sugar fields. I see no excuse or justification on the part of the sugar growers.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I stated before that in those States that have child-labor laws the violators are always fined and punished in some way. The employers may protest, but no legislation is passed retroactively for their relief, nor do they ask for it.

They calmly pay the penalty. This is also true with Federal legislation of this kind. In all my 16 years in Congress I have never known of such an amendment to an act of this type to be brought before the House for passage. We retroactively forgive people for disobeying the law. I feel we must guard against general legislation of this type as well as prevent the employment of little children.

The irony of the whole thing is that the violators are exempted from paying their full penalty for the years 1937, 1938, and 1939; but in the year 1940 they are to pay the penalty. Apparently the administration does not have the courage to come out openly and change the law. Will they come back later and ask us to forgive the violators in 1940? If you pass this bill you will rue the day you did it, for you will have started a precedent which it will be hard to stop. Labor will say, and justly, you have not the courage to vote for the employment of little children, but after the child-labor laws have been violated you will condone it. What a ridiculous and untenable position to be placed in. How can Members defend their position, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. DEROUEN. Will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. DEROUEN. I will be very happy to explain why this is in there.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I am sorry. I cannot yield for a statement, but I yield for a question, if the gentleman wishes to ask me a question.

Mr. DEROUEN. No. I wanted to explain why it is in here. This is a crop that must be saved in 60 days.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I do not yield further. We are all familiar with the raising of sugarcane, and we must prevent child labor. Also, we all know there are plenty of unemployed who are able and glad of the opportunity to work without abusing little children. I cannot believe that the Members will vote for this measure and thereby condone and put their stamp of approval on child labor. [Applause.]

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DEROUEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, it appears to me that there is so much confusion about this whole matter that one example will probably clarify the issue in everybody's mind. As Confucius once said, "A picture is worth a thousand words," so let me give you a word picture of a single case.

A gentleman landed in Washington about 6 or 7 weeks ago from the city of Chicago. He was the general counsel for a sugar corporation in Louisiana. He told me a story about a benefit check running into hundreds of thousands of dollars which was being held up in the Department of Agriculture for an alleged violation of the child-labor provision of the Sugar Act, in which there is an interdiction on hiring a child under 14 years of age. When I heard the story I thought it was wholly unbelievable and said he ought to see the Secretary of Agriculture. I made an arrangement to see the Secretary in company with this gentleman at 4:30 on that afternoon. In that company was the Secretary of Agriculture, the Solicitor General of the Department of Agriculture, the head of the Sugar Section, two or three other members of the Department, myself, and the gentleman from Chicago. This is the story that was verified in the presence of the Secretary by the Solicitor General, who had all the files.

This company had been hiring thousands of persons on this particular sugar plantation in Louisiana. It so happened that they hired a boy who said he was over 16 years of age, not 14, as provided in the law. They hired him and kept him on the pay roll, as I recall, for 2 days. Then they became suspicious of his age and finally said, "You do not look as if you are over 14, and we will have to let you go."

That is all the evidence there was in the record, according to the Secretary and the Solicitor of the Department. They had sent investigators into Louisiana, but the only evidence that they could record that this boy was under 14 years of age was a baptismal certificate that had been made 7 years after the boy was born. The priest who made the certificate could not be found. On that single case, on that flimsy evidence, they were holding up a sugar check for the year 1938 of more than $200,000.

The singular thing about it is that this company complied with the law and got their check in 1937. They complied with the law, and then this alleged violation in 1937 became the basis for holding up their 1938 check. The Department of Justice ruled that under the provisions of the law they could not release that check. The answer of the Secretary of Agriculture when we had discussed this for an hour was, "I did not know there was anything like that going on. Any sugar corporation in the country might be blackmailed, and any individual could file a trumped-up charge that some child was under 14, and hold up several hundred thousand dollars in benefits for which the grower made the sacrifice in conformity with the Sugar Act of 1937."

There we have the Secretary of Agriculture himself stating that that is a preposterous and impossible situation, and that it should be remedied. So here is an amendment to the Sugar Act designed to impose a penalty of $10 a day for future years, and making it possible to release the money now being held, and unconscionably being held, by the United States Government. It is a travesty upon the interpretation of statutes that there cannot be more common sense, that there cannot be a rule of reason applied, but that is the penalty for red tape that starts in an administrative agency, goes through an entire department, and then comes up against an irresistible barricade in the General Accounting Office. If you do justice today, you will vote overwhelmingly for this amendment to the 1937 act, because nobody wants to believe that on such a flimsy pretext and such a tenuous premise the United States Government is doing business, after these people have made their sacrifices and reduced their acreage, and on top of it paid the processing tax on the sugar they produced.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Does it not seem to the gentleman that a claim should be brought in here just as all other claims are brought in?

Mr. DIRKSEN. And then have the claim repose here in the Congress for 10 years while they go broke? Every day Uncle Sam is asking them to pay on the line when it comes time for the payment of the processing tax. No, the Government of the United States cannot do business on that basis. The Government expects payment from its taxpayers at a stated time. Therefore, the Government should pay its claims when due and payable.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. The gentleman is usually extremely anxious to have the law obeyed. You will have violations of all our laws if you allow that.

Mr. DIRKSEN. There is not an iota of possibility in that at all. I am interested in seeing this Government do justice.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. But it is condoning child labor.

Mr. DIRKSEN. There is no condonation of child labor involved here at all because there has never been proof of a violation. If a child comes to me and says, "Mr. DIRKSEN, I would like to work on your plantation," I say, "How old are you?" He may say, "I am 17." I know what the law states, that a child cannot work if he is under 14. But the boy says, "I am 17, and you can ask my father and my mother, who live in the cottage down the road." There is no baptismal certificate on record. How am I going to prove it or disprove it? Those are the bases on which these checks are being denied to the people who produce the sugar and are paying the taxes today.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I will tell the gentleman how they prove it in our State, and that is by getting the birth certificate, which they must bring to the employer. That is how they do it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The gentleman must know that many States have a very inadequate birth registration system. As a matter of fact, when I was certified for a commission in the Army I could not find any birth record on file in my home town, and Uncle Sam almost denied me a commission during the World War just on that score. So when you get into some of these other States you find that situation manifest today.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman has cited a very interesting story in describing the case he mentioned a few moments ago.

Mr. DIRKSEN. They are virtually all the same.

Mr. CONNERY. If that were the only case then we might view it in the light of one with extenuating circumstances and it would make it more possible probably for the House to look with favor on this particular bill, but if the gentleman would like to know it, and basing my statement on an official report I have received from the Sugar Division of the Department of Agriculture, I can say that in 1937 there were 25 different producers involved as violators in this type of violation in Louisiana; in 1938 there were 37 different producers in violation; and in 1939 there were 15 different producers in violation. It would be improbable to state that all of these cases are virtually all the same and to say these violations are all inadvertent.

Mr. DIRKSEN. It does not make any difference how many producers there are, it does not make any difference how much money is involved, these people have complied with the act. If there has been any violation as alleged it is due to a misrepresentation on the part of some child, and would you, in the name of conscience and justice, penalize our own citizens today on that kind of a basis? That is all the evidence there is to go on. This measure ought to be adopted by an overwhelming vote. [Applause.]

Mr. DEROUEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MOUTON].

Mr. MOUTON. Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that I believe this bill is most meritorious and worthy of favorable action on the part of the House. The Department of Agriculture has approved it, all domestic producing areas of the sugar industry are for it, the Senate has approved it, and our House Committee on Agriculture has approved it.

It will correct an inequitable condition which exists under the Sugar Act of 1937 and will harm no one in any respect whatsoever. These sugarcane and sugar-beet producers for whom the measure will afford relief are badly in need of the funds to carry on the operations of their farms. They are the victims of circumstances in being denied these payments by the Government on their crops, and I fully believe that they are deserving of this help.

I appeal to you for your support in passing the bill as offered.

Section 301 of the Sugar Act outlines the conditions which must be fulfilled by a farmer who produces sugarcane in order that he may become eligible for the payment which the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to make. There are five conditions required and one of them states that no child under 14 years of age shall be employed or permitted to work and no child under 16 years of age shall be employed or permitted to work longer than 8 hours per day.

The amendment now before the House and which has already passed the Senate unanimously, merely seeks to correct a situation which has been brought about by the fact that in the administration of the law no discretion whatsoever is permitted to the Secretary of Agriculture according to the interpretation of the law by the Department of Justice. There is no purpose to change the Sugar Act with regard to present or future enforcement. The Secretary of Agriculture has recognized the merits of the unfortunate and difficult situation existing with respect to the 1937 and 1938 crops and in his letter to the Senate Agriculture Committee, he has given his approval to the amendment. In fact, the language of the amendment now proposed was suggested by the Secretary of Agriculture in his letter, reading as follows:

> The Department, therefore, recommends that the first section of S. 3237 be changed to read as follows:
> "That subsection (a) of section 301 of the Sugar Act of 1937 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: 'The Secretary is authorized to make payments, notwithstanding a failure to comply with the conditions provided in this subsection, but the payments made with respect to any crop shall be subject to a deduction of $10 for each child for each day, or a portion of a day during which such child is employed or permitted to work contrary to the foregoing provisions of this subsection.' "

Discussing the general situation in Louisiana, the Secretary describes in his letter the administrative difficulties which are sought to be corrected by the proposed amendment. He states:

> In administering the act, a number of cases have been found in which children under age were employed or permitted to work on farms, although the producers apparently did not know that the children were under age and used reasonable precautions to ascertain the facts. In the opinion of the Department, the law now requires that payment be denied in such a case, although the producer has met all other conditions for payment provided in the act. These conditions require the payment of wages determined by the Secretary to be fair and reasonable; the carrying out of soil practices which the Secretary prescribes for preserving and improving the fertility of the soil; the holding of sugarcane or sugar-beet marketing within the limitations of the proportionate share for the farm; and, in the case of producers who are also processors, the payment of prices for sugarcane and sugar beets which the Secretary determines to be fair and reasonable. Producers who have met these conditions of the act undoubtedly suffer a hardship by reason of the withholding of payments because of inadvertent child-labor violations.

I can state to the House that my own investigation and information shows that there are only a very few cases over the period of the crops of 1937 and 1938 which show that anyone under age has found employment or been permitted to work in the sugarcane industry. I am pleased to state that a sincere effort has been made by the industry to educate and inform all of the farmers with respect to the conditions required by the Sugar Act and particularly child-labor regulations. As far as I am able to learn there has been no further evidence of children being employed during the past year, and the isolated cases in which a technical violation was found in connection with the 1937 or 1938 crops can be laid to the misrepresentations as to ages by the children or their parents, and to the fact that the existence of child-labor regulations in agriculture was something entirely new in the experience of farmers.

In every case which I know of, the young man was discharged immediately upon question being raised or doubt created as to his age. A typical case, as an illustration, is that of an orphan boy who is being supported by his uncle on a small farm. As is usual with farm boys, he performed some of the chores which every one of you who were born on a farm knows is the usual experience of farm life. The custom prevails that at harvesting time, neighbors help each other by one neighbor going with all of his laborers to help in the harvest, and this usually comes when weather conditions have placed the crop in jeopardy. Now, the boy in question had been working with his uncle and was permitted to help out under extraordinary circumstances. In the minds of the farmers there was an emergency and everybody pitched in to help. To my mind, there was no violation of the child-labor principles, especially that the provisions of section 301 (a) exempt the child of a farmer as far as work on his farm may be concerned. But, the fact remains that a boy, under age, did work on another farm.

Now, all of these matters have to be explained and brought to the knowledge of the poor farmer who may be uninformed and who is a law-abiding citizen with no intention, whatsoever, to avoid laws or regulations.

Another typical example is that of a large plantation where a man on a truck solicited laborers and took a gang on his truck out to the plantation. They were put to work as a gang on 1 day. On the next day the overseer noticed that one of the young men appeared to be too young, although well developed. He questioned the foreman, who said that the boy was 15 and could work 8 hours. The overseer was not satisfied with the representations of the boy, who could not furnish proof of his age, and so that boy was immediately paid off at the adult rate in the wage scale and told not to come back. There was no birth certificate available in this case and the agent of the owner, acting upon instructions which had been given by the owner not to employ children under 16, discharged the young man on suspicion of being under age, although the boy insisted he was over age. It is very evident that the fact of prompt discharge and the payment of the adult rate, plus the fact that the boy was not worked more than 8 hours per day, demonstrates that there was no intention or attempt to exploit children or violate the child-labor regulations. In my opinion, Congress never intended that a case of this kind should be subject to so technical an interpretation of the law that permitting a boy to work for 1 or 2 days is a violation requiring the Secretary to charge the owner with noncompliance with the entire program, although he had complied with the four other conditions.

In explanation of the proposed amendment, let me emphasize and direct your attention to the fact that this amendment does not absolve anyone from any violation, no matter how inadvertent or technical. If the regulations were violated, there must be a penalty, but the penalty should be in proportion to the offense and should be equally applied upon all persons.

All Federal and State child-labor laws have penalties which are definite and limited, and they are made to fit the offense. There are fines up to $10,000, but no higher. That is in accordance with legal procedure and enforcement.

Under the Sugar Act, the payments have become a very important part of any farmer's income for the reason that he is required to pay a higher wage rate to laborers and there is collected on all sugar a tax of one-half cent per pound. This tax is paid by the processors, but since the purchase contract for sugarcane is based upon the price of sugar, it is easy to see that the tax results in a lower price for the sugarcane bought; therefore, the Government payment is in the form of a refund to the grower of sugarcane and acts as a means of distributing the income from the crop commensurately among laborers, farmers, and processors. There should be a penalty for violation, but that penalty should not be a complete loss of all right to participate in a program when the four other conditions have been met and the tax on sugar collected, regardless. Therefore, it is proposed by this amendment to fix a penalty of $10 per day for each day that each child may be employed, so that one who violates the law persistently will have to pay a much greater penalty than one who merely employed a youth through inadvertence or because of a misrepresentation as to age, but who discharged him as soon as doubt was created as to the actual age of the person employed.

I am opposed to child labor, and I favor child-labor regulations. I want to assure my colleagues that this amendment does not excuse the employment of children. But, I must also explain that the Sugar Act is the only law which regulates child labor in agriculture. Benefit payments are made to farmers who produce cotton, wheat, corn, rice, and other products, without requirements as to child labor or wage scales in the agricultural operations. Therefore, it is easy to understand by one who chooses to be understanding that this innovation in agricultural regulation was something new in the experience of farmers during the first year or two. Since that time I can assure you the situation has improved so greatly that I know of no cases where there have been complaints of child-labor violation in the crop operations of the past year. This shows the good intentions and the effort being made to cooperate in the enforcement and observance of the law. We all recognize that the purpose and intent of child-labor regulations is constructive, and farmers should be encouraged when they show a willingness to adjust themselves to these new requirements. The enforcement of any law in America can best be obtained by reasonable recognition of the difficulties of first application or enforcement. No one can convince citizens of the fairness and desirability of a law by harsh and technical interpretations which refuse to accept the good faith of farmers, most of whom have been the victims of misrepresentation by those seeking employment and their parents.

When it is considered that there are over 70,000 workers who are employed at one time or another by the Louisiana sugar growers during each crop year, it is quite evident that the industry cannot be accused of opposition or unwillingness to observe child-labor prohibitions, when there have been less than 50 cases of technical violation holding up payments under the sugar program for the past 3 years, and those cases are admittedly not based upon evidence of willful intent or guilty knowledge.

I trust that the House will support this amendment which does not, I repeat, absolve or forgive violations of child-labor regulations but merely and solely and exclusively provides a penalty which is in proportion to the offense. Finally, let me say again that the amendment does not affect the regulations or the law with respect to present or future operations, but is merely intended to correct an unfair and unfortunate situation which has inadvertently come about but by which well-earned payments on the past crops of 1937 and 1938 are now being withheld from farmers. As already stated, this amendment has the approval of and is written in the language recommended by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD].

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I think this proposition is pretty well understood by all those present. When we enact legislation which has to do with farm labor, the hiring of people on the farm, the gathering of the crops, especially the seasonable crops which must be taken in very rapidly—and this, I think, applies to almost all the crops—we get into relationships and transactions such as we are now here discussing.

I do not believe it was the intent of the people who represent the cotton areas, the wheat areas, the corn areas, the sugar areas, the fruit areas, or any other crop area of this country, to have an act administered in this manner. I do not believe it was the intent of any of them to attempt to penalize a farm operator whether in the form of a corporation, a partnership, or a proprietorship; whether growing sugar, fruit, cotton, wheat, corn, or any other crop, and have such a burden imposed upon him for a technical violation, if you please, of this nature, even if there was a technical violation.

I certainly hope that this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. MURDOCK or Arizona. I want most certainly to protect our children, but I also want to save our farmers from unjust, illogical penalties. Does the gentleman believe that this law, if passed, will relieve a farm operator of a technical penalty without doing injury to the spirit of our child-labor laws? If so, I shall support it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The amendment proposed here will penalize a farmer $10 per day per person, or any part of a day, if he hires anyone under 14 years of age; and if you can show me how a farmer can pay $10 a day for farm labor, and get out whole, I wish you would show me the details of the operation, because I would like to know something about it.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. And this pending measure will prevent positively the hiring of child labor, will it not, on our farms and ranches?

Mr. CRAWFORD. That penalty will, of course.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Exactly. We must balance common sense and justice in these matters.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Unless you have some new kind of farm operation that I do not know anything about—and I study those matters pretty closely.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Is it not a fact that this penalty of this large amount of money taken from these Louisiana producers is largely their own money taken from them by virtue of the tax?

Mr. CRAWFORD. The grower of sugarcane and the grower of sugar beets grows those products under a participating contract, and the 55 cents per hundred tax against a bag of sugar is charged back against that sugar, and the farmer has to carry his share of the burden and the processor has to carry his share of the burden.

Now, there is just one other point. A question has been raised about somebody getting a benefit payment of around $200,000. Suppose you are growing cotton on a big cotton plantation, or wheat on a wheat plantation, or sugar on a sugar plantation. We have designed these agricultural laws so that these large benefits go to the grower, irrespective of whether it is a corporation or an individual; so that has nothing to do with the situation here at all.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Does it not seem to the gentleman from Michigan clearly fair that when people have violated the law they should pay the penalty which they knew when they violated the law they would have to pay?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I suppose the gentlewoman from Massachusetts would have us penalize a farming operative $50,000 or $100,000 or $300,000 for violating some crazy law that Congress enacted or some bureau administrator put into operation? I do not think that has anything to do with the situation at all. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division, demanded by Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts, there were—ayes 190, noes 21.

So, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CHARGES FOR ELECTRICAL ENERGY, BOULDER DAM

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 9877) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to promulgate and to put into effect charges for electrical energy generated at Boulder Dam, providing for the application of revenues from said project, authorizing the operation of the Boulder power plant by the United States directly or through agents, and for other purposes, as amended, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill, H. R. 9877, with amendments, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to, and he shall, promulgate charges, on the basis of computation thereof, for electrical energy generated at Boulder Dam during the period beginning June 1, 1937, and ending May 31, 1987, computed to be sufficient, together with other net revenues from the project, to accomplish the following purposes:

(a) To meet the cost of operation and maintenance, and to provide for replacements, of the project during the period beginning June 1, 1937, and ending May 31, 1987;

(b) To repay to the Treasury, with interest, the advances to the Colorado River Dam fund for the project made prior to June 1, 1937, within 50 years from that date (excluding advances allocated to flood control by section 2 (b) of the Project Act, which shall be repayable as provided in section 7 hereof), and such portion of such advances made on and after June 1, 1937, as (on the basis of repayment thereof within such 50-year period or periods as the Secretary may determine) will be repayable prior to June 1, 1987;

(c) To provide $600,000 for each of the years and for the purposes specified in section 2 (c) hereof; and

(d) To provide $500,000 for each of the years and for the purposes specified in section 2 (d) hereof.

Such charges may be made subject to revisions and adjustments at such times, to such extent, and in such manner, as by the terms of their promulgation the Secretary shall prescribe.

SEC. 2. All receipts from the project shall be paid into the Colorado River Dam fund and shall be available for:

(a) Annual appropriation for the operation, maintenance, and replacements of the project, including emergency replacements necessary to insure continuous operations;

(b) Repayment to the Treasury, with interest (after making provision for the payments and transfers provided in subdivisions (c) and (d) hereof), of advances to the Colorado River Dam fund for the construction of the project (excluding the amount allocated to flood control by section 2 (b) of the Project Act), and any readvances made to said fund under section 5 hereof; and

(c) Payment subject to the provisions of section 3 hereof, in commutation of the payments now provided for the States of Arizona and Nevada in section 4 (b) of the Project Act, to each of said States of the sum of $300,000 for each year of operation, beginning with the year of operation ending May 31, 1938, and continuing annually thereafter until and including the year of operation ending May 31, 1987, and such payments for any year of operation which shall have expired at the time when this subdivision (c) shall become effective shall be due immediately, and be paid, without interest, as expeditiously as administration of this act will permit, and each such payment for subsequent years of operation shall be made on or before July 31, following the close of the year of operation for which it is made. All such payments shall be made from revenues hereafter received in the Colorado River Dam fund.

Notwithstanding the foregoing provisions of this subsection, in the event that there are levied and collected by or under authority of Arizona or Nevada or by any lawful taxing political subdivision thereof, taxes upon—

(i) the project as herein defined;

(ii) the electrical energy generated at Boulder Dam by means of facilities, machinery, or equipment both owned and operated by the United States, or owned by the United States and operated under contract with the United States;

(iii) the privilege of generating or transforming such electrical energy or of use of such facilities, machinery, or equipment or of falling water for such generation or transforming; or

(iv) the transmission or control of such electrical energy so generated or transformed (as distinguished from the transmission lines and other physical properties used for such transmission or control) or the use of such transmission lines or other phyical properties for such transmission or control, payments made hereunder to the State by or under the authority of which such taxes are collected shall be reduced by an amount equivalent to such taxes. Nothing herein shall in anywise impair the right of either the State of Arizona or the State of Nevada, or any lawful taxing political subdivision of either of them, to collect nondiscriminatory taxes upon that portion of the transmission lines and all other physical properties, situated within such State and such political subdivision, respectively, and belonging to any of the lessees and/or allottees under the Project Act and/or under this act, and nothing herein shall exempt or be construed so as to exempt any such property from nondiscriminatory taxation, all in the manner provided by the constitution and laws of such State. Sums, if any, received by each State under the provisions of the Project Act shall be deducted from the first payment or payments to said State authorized by this act. Payments under this section 2 (c) shall be deemed contractual obligations of the United States, subject to the provisions of section 3 of this act.

(d) Transfer, subject to the provisions of section 3 hereof, from the Colorado River Dam fund to a special fund in the Treasury, hereby established and designated the "Colorado River development fund," of the sum of $500,000 for the year of operation ending May 31, 1938, and the like sum of $500,000 for each year of operation thereafter, until and including the year of operation ending May 31, 1987. The transfer of the said sum of $500,000 for each year of operation shall be made on or before July 31 next following the close of the year of operation for which it is made: Provided, That any such transfer for any year of operation which shall have ended at the time this section 2 (d) shall become effective, shall be made, without interest, from revenues received in the Colorado River Dam fund, as expeditiously as administration of this act will permit, and without readvances from the general funds of the Treasury. Receipts of the Colorado River development fund for the years of operation ending 1938, 1939, and 1940 (or in the event of reduced receipts during any of said years, due to adjustments under section 3 hereof, then the first receipts of said fund up to $1,500,000) are authorized to be appropriated only for the continuation and extension, under the direction of the Secretary, of studies and investigations by the Bureau of Reclamation for the formulation of a comprehensive plan for the utilization of waters of the Colorado River system for irrigation, electrical power, and other purposes, in the States of the upper division and the States of the lower division, including studies of quantity and quality of water and all other relevant factors. The next such receipts up to and including the receipts for the year of operation ending in 1955 are authorized to be appropriated only for the investigation and construction of projects for such utilization in and equitably distributed among the four States of the upper division. Such receipts for the years of operation ending in 1956 to 1987, inclusive, are authorized to be appropriated for the investigation and construction of projects for such utilization in and equitably distributed among the States of the upper division and the States of the lower division. The terms "Colorado River system", "States of the upper division", and "States of the lower division" as so used shall have the respective meanings defined in the Colorado River compact mentioned in the Project Act. Such projects shall be only such as are found by the Secretary to be physically feasible, economically justified, and consistent with such formulation of a comprehensive plan. Nothing in this act shall be construed so as to prevent the authorization and construction of any such projects prior to the completion of said plan of comprehensive development; nor shall this act be construed as affecting the right of any State to proceed independently of this act or its provisions with the investigation or construction of any project or projects. Transfers under this section 2 (d) shall be deemed contractual obligations of the United States, subject to the provisions of section 3 of this act.

SEC. 3. If, by reason of any act of God, or of the public enemy, or any major catastrophe, or any other unforeseen and unavoidable cause, the revenues, for any year of operation, after making provision for costs of operation, maintenance, and the amount to be set aside for said year for replacements, should be insufficient to make the payments to the States of Arizona and Nevada and the transfers to the Colorado River development fund herein provided for, such payments and transfers shall be proportionately reduced, as the Secretary may find to be necessary by reason thereof.

SEC. 4. (a) Upon the taking effect of this act, pursuant to section 10 hereof, the charges, or the basis of computation thereof, promulgated hereunder, shall be applicable as from June 1, 1937, and adjustments of accounts by reason thereof, including charges by and against the United States, shall be made so that the United States and all parties that have contracted for energy, or for the privilege of generating energy, at the project, shall be placed in the same position, as nearly as may be, as determined by the Secretary, that they would have occupied had such charges, or the basis of computation thereof, and the method of operation which may be provided for under section 9 hereof, been effective on June 1, 1937: Provided, That such adjustments with contractors shall not be made in cash, but shall be made by means of credits extended over such period as the Secretary may determine.

(b) In the event payments to the States of Arizona and Nevada, or either of them, under section 2 (c) hereof, shall be reduced by reason of the collection of taxes mentioned in said section, adjustments shall be made, from time to time, with each allottee which shall have paid any such taxes, by credits or otherwise, for that proportion of the amount of such reductions which the amount of the payments of such taxes by such allottee bears to the total amount of such taxes collected.

SEC. 5. If at any time there shall be insufficient sums in the Colorado River Dam fund to meet the cost of replacements, however necessitated, in addition to meeting the other requirements of this act, or of regulations authorized hereby and promulgated by the Secretary, the Secretary of the Treasury, upon request of the Secretary of the Interior, shall readvance to the said fund, in amounts not exceeding, in the aggregate, moneys repaid to the Treasury pursuant to section 2 (b) hereof, the amount required for replacements, however necessitated, in excess of the amount currently available therefor in said Colorado River Dam fund. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums, not exceeding said aggregate amount, as may be necessary to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to make such readvances. All such readvances shall bear interest.

SEC. 6. Whenever by the terms of the Project Act or this act payment of interest is provided for, and whenever interest shall enter into any computation thereunder, such interest shall be computed at the rate of 3 percent per annum, compounded annually.

SEC. 7. The first $25,000,000 of advances made to the Colorado River Dam fund for the project shall be deemed to be the sum allocated to flood control by section 2 (b) of the Project Act and repayment thereof shall be deferred without interest until June 1, 1987, after which time such advances so allocated to flood control shall be repayable to the Treasury as the Congress shall determine.

SEC. 8. The Secretary is hereby authorized from time to time to promulgate such regulations and enter into such contracts as he may find necessary or appropriate for carrying out the purposes of this act and the project act, as modified hereby, and, by mutual consent, to terminate or modify any such contract: Provided, however, That no allotment of energy to any allottee made by any rule or regulation heretofore promulgated shall be modified or changed without the consent of such allottee.

SEC. 9. The Secretary is hereby authorized to negotiate for and enter into a contract for the termination of the existing lease of the Boulder power plant made pursuant to the Project Act, and in the event of such termination the operation and maintenance, and the making of replacements, however necessitated, of the Boulder power plant by the United States, directly or through such agent or agents as the Secretary may designate, is hereby authorized. The powers, duties, and rights of such agent or agents shall be provided by contract, which may include provision that questions relating to the interpretation or performance thereof may be determined, to the extent provided therein, by arbitration or court proceedings. The Secretary, in consideration of such termination of such existing lease, is authorized to agree (a) that the lessees therein named shall be designated as the agents of the United States for the operation of said power plant; (b) that (except by mutual consent or in accordance with such provisions for termination for default as may be specified therein) such agency contract shall not be revocable or terminable; and (c) that suits or proceedings to restrain the termination of any such agency contract, otherwise than as therein provided, or for other appropriate equitable relief or remedies, may be maintained against the Secretary. Suits or other court proceedings pursuant to the foregoing provisions may be maintained in, and jurisdiction to hear and determine such suits or proceedings and to grant such relief or remedies is hereby conferred upon, the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, with the like right of appeal or review as in other like suits or proceedings in said court. The Secretary is hereby authorized to act for the United States in such arbitration proceedings.

SEC. 10. This act shall be effective immediately for the purpose of the promulgation of charges, or the basis of computation thereof, and the execution of contracts authorized by the terms of this act, but neither such charges, nor the basis of computation thereof, nor any such contract, shall be effective unless and until this act shall be effective for all purposes. This act shall take effect for all purposes when, but not before, the Secretary shall have found that provision has been made for the termination of the existing lease of the Boulder power plant and for the operation thereof as authorized by section 9 hereof, and that allottees obligated under contracts in force on the date of enactment of this act to pay for at least 90 percent of the firm energy shall have entered into contracts (1) consenting to such operation, and (2) containing such other provisions as the Secretary may deem necessary or proper for carrying out the purposes of this act. For purposes of this section such 90 percent shall be computed as of the end of the absorption periods provided for in regulations heretofore promulgated by the Secretary and in effect at the time of the enactment of this act.

If contracts in accordance with the requirements of this section shall not have been entered into prior to June 1, 1941, this act shall cease to be operative and shall be of no further force or effect.

SEC. 11. Any contractor for energy from the project failing or refusing to execute a contract modifying its existing contract to conform to this act shall continue to pay the rates and charges provided for in its existing contract, subject to such periodic readjustments as are therein provided, in all respects as if this act had not been passed, and so far as necessary to support such existing contract all of the provisions of the Project Act shall remain in effect, anything in this act inconsistent therewith notwithstanding.

SEC. 12. The following terms wherever used in this act shall have the following respective meanings:

"Project Act" shall mean the Boulder Canyon Project Act;

"Project" shall mean the works authorized by the Project Act to be constructed and owned by the United States, exclusive of the main canal and appurtenances mentioned therein, now known as the All-American Canal;

"Secretary" shall mean the Secretary of the Interior of the United States;

"Firm energy" and "allottees" shall have the meaning assigned to such terms in regulations heretofore promulgated by the Secretary and in effect at the time of the enactment of this act;

"Replacements" shall mean such replacements as may be necessary to keep the project in good operating condition during the period from June 1, 1937, to May 31, 1987, inclusive, but shall not include (except where used in conjunction with the word "emergency" or the words "however necessitated") replacements made necessary by any act of God, or of the public enemy, or by any major catastrophe; and

"Year of operation" shall mean the period from and including June 1 of any calendar year to and including May 31 of the following calendar year.

SEC. 13. The Secretary of the Interior shall, in January of each year, submit to the Congress a financial statement and a complete report of operations under this act during the preceding year of operation as herein defined.

SEC. 14. Nothing herein shall be construed as interfering with such rights as the States now have either to the waters within their borders or to adopt such policies and enact such laws as they may deem necessary with respect to the appropriation, control, and use of waters within their borders, except as modified by the Colorado River compact or other interstate agreement. Neither the promulgation of charges, or the basis of charges, nor anything contained in this act, or done thereunder, shall in anywise affect, limit, or prejudice any right of any State in or to the waters of the Colorado River system under the Colorado River compact. Sections 13 (b), 13 (c), and 13 (d) of the Project Act and all other provisions of said Project Act not inconsistent with the terms of this act shall remain in full force and effect.

SEC. 15. All laborers and mechanics employed in the construction of any part of the project, or in the operation, maintenance, or replacement of any part of the Boulder Dam, shall be paid not less than the prevailing rate of wages or compensation for work of a similar nature prevailing in the locality of the project. In the event any dispute arises as to what are the prevailing rates, the determination thereof shall be made by the Secretary of the Interior, and his decision, subject to the concurrence of the Secretary of Labor, shall be final.

SEC. 16. This act may be cited as "Boulder Canyon Project Adjustment Act."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Missouri to 20 minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM].

BACKGROUND

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Speaker, the basic purpose of this bill is to change certain features in the original Boulder Dam Act in the matter of fixed charges. This bill results from an accord between the seven States of the Colorado River Basin, the Interior Department, and the nine power contractors.

BASIC PURPOSES

The bill changes three features of the Boulder Canyon Project Act, under which Boulder Dam was built, viz., (A) the basis of fixed charges payable out of the Colorado River Dam fund; (B) the basis of rate determination, and (C) the method of operating the power plant. It does not affect the Colorado River Compact, the All-American Canal, or other features of the Project Act, nor the primary conception that power is being sold to pay for the dam, rather than the dam being built to sell power, and is subordinate to navigation, flood control, and irrigation.

A

Changes in fixed charges are made in four respects, as follows:

First. Interest is reduced from 4 to 3 percent. Four percent is excessive. The actual cost of Federal borrowings outstanding during construction of the dam was slightly less than 2.8 percent. The present long-term Federal interest cost, as determined by R. E. A. is 2.66 percent. A rate of 3 percent is authorized for power development by the Reclamation Repayment Act of 1939. At Bonneville 3½ percent is charged at present, but is not fixed by statute, and may be changed; this rate is charged on only 32 percent of the investment, the rest being written off; no firm-power contracts were made in advance, and the Government bears the risk of finding a market after completion. The market for Boulder Dam energy was assured, in advance of construction, by firm contracts for 100 percent of the firm power for 50 years. A lower rate of interest, commensurate with the lesser risk, is justified. Four percent is charged on P. W. A. loans, but 45 percent of the project cost is written off. There was no grant here.

Second. Twenty-five million dollars was allocated by the Project Act to flood control—although a flood-control dam would have cost $35,000,000 to $40,000,000—to be repaid only out of excess revenues, if any. If they were inadequate, repayment was deferred until the rest of the investment was repaid. Recent studies indicate that there would be no excess whatever after 1945. The bill makes the flood-control allocation definitely repayable, without interest, after the balance of the investment is retired, and waives interest on it. Flood-control expenditures are ordinarily nonreimbursable. The flood protection is not for the power users but for farming communities two or three hundred miles away from the center of power use.

Third. Twenty-five million dollars, not required by the Project Act, must be paid the Treasury under the bill for use in the development of the Colorado River Basin at the rate of $500,000 per year.

Fourth. Three hundred thousand dollars each year will be paid to each of the States of Arizona and Nevada in commutation of the 18¾ percent of excess revenues given each State by the Project Act.

B

The bill stabilizes the rate base. The Project Act set up an initial rate standard and a different rate standard for periodic revisions:

First. The rate initially fixed was required to be high enough, if maintained for 50 years, to repay the investment—minus flood control—with interest. The rate actually fixed was over 50 percent higher than even that requirement, because only 64 percent of the contract revenues were taken into account, the metropolitan water district's contract being ignored because the district had not then voted bonds. It has since done so and built a $200,000,000 aqueduct for municipal and domestic purposes. Thus the initial rate, during the early years, is very high; but—

Second. The Project Act required a rate revision in 1945, and each 10 years afterward, upward or downward, as competitive prices—costs of fuel-generated power—at distributing points and competitive centers might require. In 1930 it was generally believed that the sources of supply of fuel oil were nearing depletion, that fuel prices would advance very substantially, and that, therefore, rates based upon competitive conditions would assure amortization in 50 years. Instead, new sources of supply for the Los Angeles area have been developed and fuel-oil prices have materially decreased. The existing act, therefore, does not assure amortization within 50 years, because the present rate is subject to an early downward revision; which would probably eliminate all excess revenues, and hence any further payments on the flood-control item or to Arizona and Nevada.

The bill abolishes the hazardous and speculative competitive basis and substitutes a rate mathematically computed to be adequate to meet operation, maintenance, replacements, and all fixed charges enumerated above. Complete amortization of the investment is assured for the first time.

C

Changes in operation of the plant: The bill is contingent on substitution of Government operation, directly or through agents, for the present lease. Secretary Ickes has agreed that if the bill is adopted the plant will be operated by the present lessees, the city of Los Angeles and the Southern California Edison Co., Ltd., as Government agents.

SUMMARY OF RESULTS OF THE BILL

The Government is assured:

First. The receipt of all money necessary for operation and maintenance and for the ordinary replacements required to keep the dam and power plant in good operating condition;

Second. The return of its entire investment within the 50-year period, with interest, except the $25,000,000 flood-control item, which will be repayable after the 50-year period, without interest, although ordinarily flood-control advances are not repayable at all;

Third, twenty-five million dollars for development in the river basin; and

Fourth. The ownership of the dam and power plant, which during the 50-year period will be operated and, through maintenance and replacements, kept in good operating condition, at the expense of the power contractors, and at the end of the period, although fully paid for by them, owned by the Government.

Under P. W. A. power projects constructed during the same period the Government loaned 55 percent of the cost and made an outright grant of 45 percent. After the borrower had repaid slightly more than half the cost, with interest, it, and not the Government, owned the project. Here the Government gets all its money back and owns the plant forever.

The power users receive a rate assured against major fluctuations for 50 years. Although the rate will be lower than the rate fixed until 1945, it will be higher than the present cost of steam power.

Arizona and Nevada receive fixed amounts in lieu of taxes, instead of a speculative share of profits, if any, thus through the payment of an amount fixed by compromise carrying out the intent of the original act.

All the Colorado River Basin shares not only in the benefits of the Government's development fund but also in the elimination of features of the existing law which in the past have resulted in discord.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Does the gentleman feel that this legislation would guarantee the United States Treasury repayment in better and more certain form than the present existing law?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Absolutely.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT].

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, this is rather a complicated and comprehensive bill to consider adequately and thoroughly in the 40 minutes allotted to it under suspension of the rules. It really demonstrates I think as clearly as any bill which we will have before us this year the result of certain power policies inaugurated by the New Deal, and which are now beginning to bear a harvest in legislation of this type. It will be recalled that the Boulder Dam project was one of the first big power projects of the country. It was put through under a Republican administration under the old-fashioned idea that those communities receiving the benefits of power projects should be compelled to pay for these benefits, and would be compelled to pay for them by paying for power rates lower than formerly, but high enough to amortize the project. But since that time have come the Bonneville project, the T. V. A. development, and others put forth under a different philosophy, a philosophy that the public as a whole should pay for power projects destined primarily to give preferential rates to particular localities. Coming from a State where we have few industries, it is not my particular problem, except to point out to States like the New England States, and industrial areas like Illinois, Indiana, and Wisconsin, all of which have representatives here to take care of their interests, that if we continue the philosophy of loading upon the entire Federal Treasury and all of the taxpayers, the responsibility of paying for projects to give preferential low-power rates to certain localities, the industries of this country will gravitate to the areas around those power projects inevitably as a law of economics.

But coming from a great farm State, as I do, I have no further obligations in that regard except to point out the fact to representatives of areas directly interested. I do point this out as a member of the committee which studied this bill, as this is a dangerous manifestation of the trend which under the New Deal has been accentuated and aggravated to a very hazardous degree; that is, that after a series of power projects have been completed and a survey is made, if it is then determined that project C has made a preferential deal with the Government, the representatives of projects A and B and D and E come to Congress and say, "We are entitled to just as good a deal as that of project C." Consequently, Gresham's law of money comes into play in the power business, and the bad projects drive out the good projects, just as bad money drives out good money in a monetary system, and good Government contracts such as this one are driven out of existence by arguments, more or less valid, which we have heard used by gentlemen interested in this seven-State project. This good project is being driven out of existence because the bad projects of T. V. A. and preferential contracts at Bonneville have given them preferential rates in comparison with Boulder Dam. So we see the rule in operation very clearly in this legislation. The worst contract from the standpoint of the Government and the taxpayers becomes the standard which all other projects seek to emulate.

Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to penalize the States interested in this particular project; they have good reason to ask for consideration comparable to that given other projects. But, by the same token, so have all other communities a right and reason to ask for cheaper power if that is to be accepted as a responsibility of the Government.

I call attention to the manner in which Gresham's law works on Government projects not to defeat this specific cry for help but to caution Congress that since the worst deal in a series tends to become the universal law of the land, Congress should go slow in setting up unsound projects in any field of endeavor.

I say, I think there is some logic in the argument that we should not penalize this particular project for uneconomic concessions extending to others, but it does demonstrate clearly that if this country continues the procedure of taxing the citizens of all the country to give preferential power rates to citizens in a small section of the country, the industries which are now happily located in New England, in Ohio, in Illinois, and elsewhere will no longer pay taxes in those States, but will quite naturally go to the areas where the Government as a whole, using the taxpayers' money taken from the people as a whole, is giving cheap power rates to those areas.

Mr. GEYER of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MUNDT. If I have time.

Mr. GEYER of California. You would not object to taxing the whole country to help out certain sections for agriculture, would you?

Mr. MUNDT. I certainly would object to any position which would tend to make an unjust relationship between agriculture and the whole country. The difficulty with your implied argument is that the rest of the country has been mooching on the farmers for the past 10 years, failing to pay the farmer the cost of production for the things which he raises on the farm.

Mr. GEYER of California. Since this is the farmer, then it is all right?

Mr. MUNDT. Since which is the farmer?

Mr. GEYER of California. Since the discrimination is in favor of the farmer, this is O. K.?

Mr. MUNDT. To my best knowledge, the Government unfortunately has never discriminated in favor of the farmer. The farmer has always gotten the seamy side of the cloak of discrimination.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HINSHAW].

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I have a very high regard for the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT]. He and I are personal friends. I know he has given a great deal of study to this measure and that he has arrived at certain conclusions with which, unfortunately, I cannot agree.

In the first place, mention is made that we will receive some preferentially low power rates in California. I would like to inform the House and my good friend that, as far as we are concerned, we can generate steam-generated power from oil much cheaper than we can buy it from Boulder Dam. The only reason we are interested now, as we have been in the past, in the power from Boulder Dam is the fact that we need water. We must have water. In order to get water we must have Boulder Dam.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Is it not a fact that at the time of the construction of the Boulder Canyon project you could generate power cheaper at Los Angeles than you could get it from the Boulder Canyon project?

Mr. HINSHAW. That is quite true.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. And you made that sacrifice in order to get your permanent water supply?

Mr. HINSHAW. That is exactly true. I thank the gentleman from Utah. We paid a higher rate for power than we needed to in the first place, and we are willing to pay it now, in order to get water, for our land without water is a desert. With the water our land becomes a garden, and many of you who have been there know what it is. Anyone who would intimate that we do not intend to pay for this project is certainly misunderstanding the question and, I believe, misstating the facts.

In this whole plan we are guaranteeing the payment of 100 cents on the dollar to the United States Government for the loan which it is making to us to enable us directly or indirectly to obtain water. We are paying interest on that loan, and we are doing something beyond that. We are paying for a flood-control project which is as far from the consuming center of this power as Pittsburgh is from Washington. If any Member of this House knows any district in the United States that itself, as a district, is paying for a flood-control project 175 miles from its back door, I would like to know where it is. But we are doing all those things in order to obtain water. I think we should have your favorable consideration on this bill and give us a chance to compete somewhat with the other sections of the country.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. What rate of interest?

Mr. HINSHAW. We are now paying 4 percent interest, and the interest rate will be reduced under this bill to 3 percent.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SHORT. I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Is it not true that after we have paid back the entire sum, after we have paid $25,000,000 for flood control, which no other power project ever paid, then we turn the thing back to the United States free and clear for its use and benefit forever?

Mr. HINSHAW. The gentleman is entirely correct. We not only pay for it and pay interest on the loan and pay for $25,000,000 worth of flood control which is of no direct benefit to us, but we give it back to the United States free and clear and pay for the development of the upper and lower basin States to boot.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. What explanation do you give for the reduction in the interest rate which you are asking? Why should you have a reduction from 4 to 3 percent?

Mr. HINSHAW. That is a very complicated subject and I will try to explain it briefly. In the first place, the present arrangement is that every 10 years the rates for power shall be adjusted in accordance with the competitive rates in Los Angeles County. Those competitive rates will be reduced in 1945. The sum of money we pay to the Colorado River Dam fund is the sum that we will pay for electricity on a competitive rate. Then the Colorado River Dam fund in turn distributes that to the Treasury, paying part of it in interest and part of it in principal. If you leave the contract as it is, the Government will be the loser; also will other States which are cooperating with us in this venture, because the rates will be very considerably reduced under the existing plan. While it actually appears to be a reduction in interest the total amount that will be paid to the Government under the new plan is equal to or greater than under the present plan.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Is it not true that this legislation substitutes a certainty for an uncertainty?

Mr. HINSHAW. It substitutes a certainty for an uncertainty both to the Government and to the people of the Basin States and to the power consumers in Los Angeles County, the ones paying this bill.

Mr. Speaker, this bill (H. R. 9877) represents a meeting of the minds of the responsible officials in seven Western States and in a number of cities in Los Angeles County and several other power contractors such as the Metropolitan Water District. It has been a colossal task to bring about this meeting of minds of so many divergent interests. After their agreement had been consummated, the Department of the Interior, the Bureau of the Budget, and the Attorney General of the United States all had their day and say. I pay special tribute to the energy and persistence of the committee of sixteen and its able chairmen, and to the dogged perseverance of Mr. E. F. Scattergood, general manager of the bureau of water and power of the City of Los Angeles. These men have served their people well and faithfully in bringing this solution to fruition.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LELAND M. FORD].

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join in what my colleague the gentleman from California [Mr. HINSHAW] has just said. The facts, briefly, are these: We are asking for 3 percent interest. We have paid 4. Out in our district we put up $220,000,000. We did not come around asking for any gift. We put up our own money. We are going to pay it off 100 percent. When the time is up the Government will get this dam without putting any money into it, it will be paid off fully. We are paying interest on it.

We are not asking for any grants, we are just asking that we be not discriminated against with reference to this matter of interest. Many interests of the country fare far more liberally than we have—they have received grants, they have received higher percentages with reference to the amount of flood control that has been written off. As my colleague says, the flood control provided by this dam is not in our district, it is 170 miles from us. The flood control goes primarily to the Imperial Valley. Notwithstanding that we are paying it off, but we feel we are entitled to this adjustment. Furthermore, we have agreed to take 100 percent of the power. Let me point out for your information that in no other case in the construction of any of these new dams has a community been required to take all the power. We took it notwithstanding the fact that we could produce power in our own city at a rate far cheaper. But we took it in order to get the water. We believe we are entitled to the bill because we are paying our way and we are not asking any grants.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. HORTON].

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I will not take 5 minutes because I see the Members have made up their minds on this bill. I am not a member of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, but I have followed this bill for the last 20 years. I want to assure the House that I am absolutely in favor of this bill and all the provisions of the bill.

There is no question in the world but what the Government will get every dollar and get it more surely under these new provisions than under the old. Every dollar will be returned to the Government. The title to the Boulder Dam project is now in the name of the Government, and when the cost is entirely paid off title will still remain in the Government.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HORTON. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I want to confirm every word the gentleman has said. I am a member of the Committee on Reclamation which had this bill under consideration. We held extensive hearings on the matter. I am convinced that the Government today through the enactment of this bill will be much better secured for the return of the money that it has invested than it has been under the law as it exists. I have supported the bill all along, and am going to support it today.

Mr. HORTON. I may say that this is not a departmental bill. This bill is the result of 20 years of effort and intensive study on the part of outstanding engineers of the West.

The Colorado River compact was entered into after extensive hearings. The gentleman from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM], for instance, was there at that time as was also the Governor of Wyoming, who afterward went to the United States Senate. Another man who became Governor of Wyoming was also there. That is the type of men who worked this thing out. The best engineers throughout that western country worked on the bill. So it is not in any sense of the word a departmental bill, but is the result of intensive study on the part of those best fitted to understand the subject.

BOULDER CANYON PROJECT ADJUSTMENT ACT

The question of modification of the Boulder Canyon Project Act as to rates and repayment, without modification of the rights of Arizona and Nevada, or of the Basin States, was before Congress in 1937. At that time it was opposed by the Interior Department and the congressional delgations of all four of the Upper Basin States of the Colorado River. Such legislation not only involved the determination of a fair rate base but protection of the Government's investment and adjustment of the interests of the States of the Colorado River Basin.

The Secretary of the Interior and various Members of Congress at that time advised the power contractors at Boulder Dam that it would be necessary for them to confer with the representatives of the States of the basin. Since Boulder Dam and its facilities were a reclamation project, operated and maintained under direction of the Interior Department, the Secretary stated he would cooperate in an attempt to reach an understanding among the various interests as a basis of proposed legislation. The Government as an interested party was thus properly represented through the Interior Department with active participation of the Reclamation Bureau.

For a period of over a year the representatives of the States and power contractors carried on conferences. Questions affecting power rates and resulting revenues from the Boulder power plant were involved. This necessitated the making of extensive studies which were undertaken by all the interested parties.

After the basis of agreement between the States and power contractors was reached, there followed numerous conferences with officials, engineers, and accountants of the Interior Department in an effort to reach a form of legislation which would protect the Government investment and at the same time preserve the essential features of the agreement between the interests in the basin. It was also referred to the Treasury Department and Budget Bureau.

The legislation now before Congress thus had its inception in and is sponsored by the interests within the Colorado River basin. It has the approval of the Department of the Interior as evidenced by the report of that Department. It clearly defines the interests of the parties involved; it removes the uncertainties and ambiguities of the original act; and it provides for a more certain repayment of the Government's investment in 50 years by fixing the rate base on an amortization basis instead of leaving the rate to be adjusted from time to time on a competitive basis.

The legislation is sought by the interests in the seven Colorado River basin States, but is designed to and does protect the investment of the Government.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Speaker, so far as the people of Utah are concerned, this bill is the most vital that this House will consider, or has considered at this session of Congress. Back in 1922, Wyoming, Colorado, Utah, New Mexico, Arizona, Nevada, and California, the seven great States comprising the drainage system of the Colorado River, entered into a compact dividing the waters of the Colorado River between what were designated in the compact as the upper and lower basins of the Colorado River. In the upper basin are the States of Utah, Wyoming, Colorado, and New Mexico; and in the lower basin, Arizona, Nevada, and California. Besides dividing the water, the compact contemplated and comprehended a comprehensive development and utilization of this great resource, the Colorado River. It contemplated the utilization of every drop of water in that great river system that it was feasible and possible to conserve for domestic use, for irrigation, for mining, for power, and for recreation. After the compact was duly signed by the seven signatory States, it was then referred to the legislatures of the respective States for ratification. All of the States ratified it with the exception of Arizona. Arizona's Legislature, up to this time, has failed to ratify, but we are still hopeful that she will see the light and see the equity of ratification, and that we may soon announce to the Congress that Arizona has joined her six sister States.

In 1928 the Boulder Canyon Project Act was passed. It provided for the construction of what is now commonly referred to as the Boulder Dam. The primary purpose of this great dam and the reservoir created thereby was the assurance to southern California and its rapidly expanding population a permanent and adequate supply of culinary water. There were secondary purposes, such as power, flood control, and navigation, and we find now that the recreational features made possible by this vast dam and reservoir loom very large in the picture, and it will probably develop into one of the Nation's greatest recreational centers.

It was known at the time of the passage of the Boulder Canyon Project Act in 1928 that power could be developed cheaper right in Los Angeles than it could be generated and transmitted from the Boulder Canyon project to Los Angeles and the surrounding territory. But in order to assure the great population of southern California an adequate and permanent culinary water supply, the people and even the utility companies engaged in business in that locality were willing to sacrifice something in the way of increased power rates in order to secure this permanent supply of culinary water.

The failure of Arizona to ratify the compact by legislative act created a barrier to the act, but this was overcome by Congress agreeing in the act itself that with the ratification of six States the Federal Government would proceed with the project. Congress, considering the compact entered into and ratified by the six States, definitely understood that each and all of the States along the Colorado River had a vital stake in its development.

Southern California, realizing that the power facilities to be developed afforded by far the best means of repayment to the Government of the Federal investment in the project, placed the burden of repayment on power revenues. The Boulder Canyon Project Act provided that not one dollar of Federal money should be expended on the project until contracts were entered into securely and adequately providing for repayment of the principal and interest necessary in the construction of the project within the period of 50 years. The act also provided that $25,000,000 of the amount necessary for construction should be allocated to flood control. This item was to be repaid out of 62½ percent of excess power revenues; 18¾ percent of excess revenues was to be paid to each of the States of Nevada and Arizona. The act also provided an interest rate of 4 percent. It also provided that after repayment of the $25,000,000 allocated to flood control, all excess revenues from power above the 37½ percent going to the States of Arizona and Nevada should be paid into a development fund, which should be earmarked and set apart for the development of the Colorado River and its tributaries. The act provided that the rate of falling water at the dam per kilowatt-hour should be based on competitive rates in the area of consumption of the power.

The Bureau of Reclamation worked out in great detail elaborate schedules of revenues from the dam and segregated these revenues into payments of principal, interest, maintenance, and upkeep, replacement payments to Arizona and Nevada, retirement of the flood-control item, and finally, payments into the development fund. Graphs were also prepared, fully illustrating what the revenues would be and their disposition. In these schedules of revenues and their disbursement, and in these graphs illustrating the receipt of revenues and their disposition, a very vivid and beautiful picture was painted to the upper basin States as to what would be received in the development fund for development in these States.

The people and the officials of my State—and I am sure the same thing can be said for the other upper basin States—looked forward to the completion of this great Boulder Canyon project and the vast revenues to come in from it with the hope and ambition that it would not be long until projects in Utah and the other States would be commenced and completed. The act provided that in 1945 power rates should be revised upward or downward, according to competitive conditions in the area of consumption of power. California seemed unwilling to wait until 1945 for this revision. Immediately on completion of the project, and even before one dime had been repaid to the Federal Government by the power contractors, consisting of the city of Los Angeles, the Metropolitan Water District, which includes the city of Los Angeles, and a number of other cities and communities in its vicinity, and the Southern California Edison Co., started a movement for revision of power rates. They called attention to the fact that the interest rate of 4 percent was exorbitant. They pointed out that rates at Bonneville and rates promulgated by the Tennessee Valley Authority were unfair and prejudicial to southern California because of higher rates she would have to pay in the use of Boulder power.

A hearing was had before the Secretary of the Interior, but, being unwilling to even await the decision of Secretary Ickes, the power contractors from the Boulder Canyon project sponsored legislation in the form of a rider which was attached to the Bonneville project legislation 3 years ago. Realizing that this legislation was absolutely unfair to my State and prejudicial to her interests, I opposed the rider to the Bonneville legislation before the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House. I opposed it on the floor of the House, and the result was that it was stricken from the Bonneville bill.

We were threatened by Nevada, Arizona, and California Senators that the rider would be attached in the Senate, so I followed the legislation to the Senate, appeared before Senate committees, conferred with Senators from the seven Colorado River States, and the rider providing for modification of rates at Boulder was unsuccessful in passage at that time. During these committee hearings and during conferences on this legislation, I adamantly and consistently took the position that my State had not been provided for in the original act; that what it was to get from power revenues from the Boulder Canyon project were very uncertain and indefinite, and that before I would agree to any modification of these rates, I would have to know definitely what was coming to the upper basin States for development of projects in these States, and especially in the State of Utah. On being asked what I considered the upper basin States were entitled to, I arrived at a minimum of $500,000 annually, to be paid into a development fund for the upper basin States during the 50-year period of amortization.

My suggestion of $500,000 to the upper-basin States annually was ridiculed and denounced by the power contractors as being exorbitant and unreasonable. After the adjournment of Congress in 1937, the Governors of the Colorado River States began negotiations with respect to modification of power rates. These negotiations and conferences have been continued right up to and during the present session of Congress. A bill was finally unanimously agreed upon by the agents and officials representing the 7 States. This bill was introduced by Governor Scrugham of Nevada and finally was brought to my attention. I gave the bill thorough study and pointed out that the question of transmountain diversion was not sufficiently and definitely provided for in the Scrugham bill. I pointed out to the sponsors of the bill that the provision for the utilization of the waters of the Colorado River system for irrigation, electrical power, and other purposes in the upper basin and lower basin as defined in the compact might be technically construed as precluding transmountain diversions, and inasmuch as any comprehensive development or utilization of the Colorado River and its tributaries in Utah would of necessity have to include transmountain diversion projects, I would not consent to the bill unless the term "States of the upper division" and "States of the lower division" were substituted for "upper basin" and "lower basin."

This amendment was agreed to and placed in the bill. The bill, as introduced by the gentleman from Nevada, Congressman SCRUGHAM, provided for an annual payment of $500,000 into a development fund. It also provided for a payment of $600,000 annually to the State of Nevada and Arizona. But the payments to Arizona and Nevada were to commence June 30, 1938, and payments into the development fund were not to begin until 2 years later, that is, June 30, 1940. I pointed out that since both payments, that is, payments to Arizona and Nevada on the one hand, and payments into the development fund on the other, came from the same source under the original act, to wit, excess revenues, it would be manifestly unfair to allow the disparity of 2 years in commencing these payments. On this question I appeared before the House Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation some weeks ago, and, after my presentation of the matter to the committee, the power contractors, as well as the committee, were convinced that my position was correct and equitable, so they readily agreed to and did accept my amendment providing for commencement of payments into the development fund beginning June 30, 1938, the same as payments for Arizona and Nevada. This amendment also provided that the additional $1,000,000 into the development fund, as a result of advancing the time of payment for 2 years, should go exclusively to the Upper Basin States. Thus my amendment resulted in adding $1,000,000 net to the development fund for the Upper Basin States. I also called attention to the fact that payments to Nevada and Arizona were made contractual obligations of the Federal Government, but that such a provision had been omitted so far as payments into the development fund were concerned, pointing out again the inequity of this omission. I was able to justify my position on this question to the satisfaction of the Irrigation and Reclamation Committee, and the amendment suggested by me, making transfers to the development fund contractual obligations of the Federal Government, was adopted by the committee, thus precluding future Congresses from tampering with or modifying this feature of the bill.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that the bill in its present form will not be satisfactory to some of the people of Utah. It is not wholly satisfactory to me; but my observation in 8 years as a Member of Congress is that if you wait until all people are satisfied, if you refuse to agree to anything until every group has placed its approval on legislation, the result is no legislation. I have been given to understand, and it has been testified to by officials from the Bureau of Reclamation, that in all probability there would never be any payments into the development fund under the provisions of the present act, that notwithstanding the beautiful and optimistic pictures painted by the Bureau of Reclamation back in 1928, with reference to the vast amount which would go into the development fund, we must now disillusion ourselves and face the fact that unless this bill, or something similar to it, is passed there would be nothing at all paid into the development fund. I have never been able to agree with the Bureau of Reclamation on this construction of the original act, but it is the Bureau of Reclamation and the Secretary of the Interior who must administer the act; and whether I like it or not, I am bound by their construction.

I am frank to admit that $500,000 divided among four States; as it must be, and for a certain period during the period of amortization, among all seven States, is not a very large sum of money; but, as compared with nothing, it assumes astronomical proportions; and it is my best judgment that it is probably the best proposition that we will ever be able to work out on the disposition of the power revenues from the Boulder project. The propitious time to have definitely fixed the rights of Utah and the rights of the other upper-basin States was in the original act. This was not done. Whether it was the result of dereliction, neglect, indifference, or what not, on the part of Utah's delegation in Congress at that time, I will not say, but on coming to Congress I had to take what I found, and with the little I found to work with I feel that the result contained in the present bill should be very satisfactory. The bill as originally introduced by the gentleman from Nevada, Governor SCRUGHAM, was apparently considered satisfactory by the officials of the State of Utah, and particularly by the splendid gentlemen who represented the Governor of Utah in the preparation of the bill. The bill as it now comes to us, containing my amendments, is an infinitely better bill.

Under the terms of the present bill, there will be adequate money for all necessary surveys of projects, which, of course, is the first and most important step in a comprehensive development of the waters of the Colorado River. Agricultural development in the State of Utah has little chance of expansion except in the utilization of the waters of the Colorado River. Hydroelectric development in the State of Utah is also largely limited to utilization of the waters of this great river. There is being surveyed now in Utah, among other projects, what is commonly referred to as the Colorado River-Great Basin project. This is a gigantic project, including storage reservoirs, power dams, and transmountain diversion. If the project proves feasible, it will result in doubling the agricultural population of the State of Utah. It will make possible cheap and abundant hydroelectric power, which will bring large fabrication plants to Utah for the fabrication of our vast stores of copper, lead, zinc, iron, alunite, and other metals and minerals. In fact, this project, if and when constructed, will result in making Utah industrially, agriculturally, economically, and socially, a State of double its present population and importance. Some people, by reason of the size of this project and the enormity of its cost, are rather prone to discount it and even scoff at its possibility. Other people, including competent engineers, in discussing and contemplating it, are very enthusiastic. I prefer to take my position with the latter group. No great project, regardless of its nature, has ever been begun or completed if approached with a faint heart simply because of enormous size and costs. If the project is feasible, it should be constructed, and, in my opinion, will be constructed. If determined to be not feasible, then there are hundreds of lesser projects from one end of the State to the other on which moneys received under this bill can be efficiently expended. This bill makes certain and definite what in the present act is uncertain and indefinite. One of my colleagues on the Republican side referred to the fact that the Boulder Canyon project was initiated by a Republican administration. That is true. But, as is typical of Republican administrations, the original act now is conspicuous by reason of its uncertainty, by reason of its indefiniteness. The Democratic Party has been delayed 8 years now in rectifying this mistake of the Republican Party; but during this delay the Democratic Party has been busy and has had its hands full rectifying and correcting other mistakes of the Republican Party. We have at last reached this one, and we take pride in now clothing this great project in Democratic certainty, substituting Democratic certainty and definiteness for Republican uncertainty and indefiniteness. The Boulder Canyon project, in my opinion, constitutes the outstanding monument in the United States to the wisdom and farsightedness of the reclamation program, and I take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, of complimenting the present Commissioner of the Bureau of Reclamation, John C. Page, who is a splendid gentleman, a competent engineer, and an excellent administrator. Under his guidance and administration there has been commenced and will be completed the greatest reclamation and conservation program ever undertaken by the human race. In conclusion I recommend the passage of this bill and trust that there will not be one dissenting vote to its approval.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the rules be suspended and the bill, as amended, passed?

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, House Resolution 503 and House Resolution 497 will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

PREVENTION OF PUBLICATION OF INVENTIONS IN THE NATIONAL INTEREST

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 10058) to amend the act relating to preventing the publication of inventions in the national interest, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress approved October 6, 1917 (40 Stat. 394, ch. 95, U. S. C., title 35, sec. 42), be amended to read as follows:

"Whenever the publication or disclosure of an invention by the granting of a patent might, in the opinion of the Commissioner of Patents, be detrimental to the public safety or defense, he may order that the invention be kept secret and withhold the grant of a patent for such period or periods as in his opinion the national interest requires: Provided, That the invention disclosed in the application for said patent may be held abandoned upon it being established before or by the Commissioner that in violation of said order said invention has been published or disclosed or that an application for a patent therefor has been filed in a foreign country by the inventor or his assigns or legal representatives, without the consent or approval of the Commissioner of Patents.

"When an applicant whose patent is withheld as herein provided and who faithfully obeys the order of the Commissioner of Patents above referred to shall tender his invention to the Government of the United States for its use, he shall, if and when he ultimately receives a patent, have the right to sue for compensation in the Court of Claims, such right to compensation to begin from the date of the use of the invention by the Government: Provided, That the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy or the chief officer of any established defense agency of the United States, as the case may be, is authorized to enter into an agreement with the said applicant in full settlement and compromise for the damage accruing to him by reason of the order of secrecy, and for the use of the invention by the Government."

SEC. 2. This act shall take effect on approval and shall remain in force for a period of 2 years from such date.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded? Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I made an explanation of this bill when it was sought to be brought up under unanimous consent. It is a very important measure in the matter of national defense and very much desired by the Navy and the War Department.

If there are no questions with reference to it, I do not care to occupy the time of the House further.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the rules be suspended and the bill passed?

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a brief newspaper article.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOUSTON]?

There was no objection.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 544) entitled "Joint resolution making appropriations for work relief and relief for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941," disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. ADAMS, Mr. GLASS, Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. HAYDEN, Mr. BYRNES, Mr. HALE, and Mr. TOWNSEND to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

AMENDMENT OF BANKRUPTCY ACT

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 9139) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 81 of chapter IX of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved July 1, 1898, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 81. This act and proceedings thereunder are found and declared to be within the subject of bankruptcies and, in addition to the jurisdiction otherwise exercised, courts of bankruptcy shall exercise original jurisdiction as provided in this chapter for the composition of indebtedness of, or authorized by, any of the taxing agencies or instrumentalities hereinafter named, payable (a) out of assessments or taxes, or both, levied against and constituting liens upon property in any of said taxing agencies or instrumentalities, or (b) out of property acquired by foreclosure of any such assessments or taxes or both, or (c) out of income derived by such taxing agencies or instrumentalities from the sale of water or power or both, or (d) from any combination thereof: (1) Drainage, drainage and levee, levee, levee and drainage, reclamation, water, irrigation, or other similar districts, commonly designated as agricultural improvement districts or local improvement districts, organized or created for the purpose of constructing, improving, maintaining, and operating certain improvements or projects devoted chiefly to the improvement of lands therein for agricultural purposes; or (2) local improvement districts, such as sewer, paving, sanitary, or other similar districts, organized or created for the purposes designated by their respective names; or (3) local improvement districts, such as road, highway, or other similar districts, organized or created for the purpose of grading, paving, or otherwise improving public streets, roads, or highways; or (4) public-school districts or public-school authorities organized or created for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, and operating public schools or public-school facilities; or (5) local improvement districts, such as port, navigation, or other similar districts, organized or created for the purpose of constructing, improving, maintaining, and operating ports and port facilities; or (6) any county or parish or any city, town, village, borough, township, or other municipality: Provided, however, That if any provision of this chapter, or the application thereof to any such taxing agency or district or class thereof or to any circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of the chapter, or the application of such provision to any other or different taxing agency or district or class thereof or to any other or different circumstances, shall not be affected by such holding."

SEC. 2. Section 83 (b) of chapter IX of such act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(b) Upon approving the petition as properly filed, or at any time thereafter, the judge shall enter an order fixing a time and place for a hearing on the petition, which shall be held within 90 days from the date of said order, and shall provide in the order that notice shall be given to creditors of the filing of the petition and its approval as being properly filed, and of the time and place for the hearing. The judge shall prescribe the form of the notice, which shall specify the manner in which claims and interests of creditors shall be filed or evidenced, on or before the date fixed for the hearing. The notice shall be published at least once a week for three successive weeks in at least one newspaper of general circulation published within the jurisdiction of the court, and in such other paper or papers having a general circulation among bond dealers and bondholders as may be designated by the court, and the judge may require that it may be published in such other publication as he may deem proper. The judge shall require that a copy of the notice be mailed, postage prepaid, to each creditor of the petitioner named in the petition at the address of such creditor given in the petition, or, if no address is given in the petition for any creditor and the address of such creditor cannot with reasonable diligence be ascertained, then a copy of the notice shall be mailed, postage prepaid, to such creditor addressed to him as the judge may prescribe. All expense of giving notice as herein provided shall be paid by the petitioner. The notice shall be first published, and the mailing of copies thereof shall be completed at least 60 days before the date fixed for the hearing.

"At any time not less than 10 days prior to the time fixed for the hearing, any creditor of the petitioner affected by the plan may file an answer to the petition controverting any of the material allegations therein and setting up any objection he may have to the plan of composition. The judge may continue the hearing from time to time if the percentage of creditors required herein for the confirmation of the plan shall not have accepted the plan in writing, or if for any reason satisfactory to the judge the hearing is not completed on the date fixed therefor. At the hearing, or a continuance thereof, the judge shall decide the issues presented and unless the material allegations of the petition are sustained shall dismiss the proceeding. If, however, the material allegations of the petition are sustained, the judge shall classify the creditors according to the nature of their respective claims and interests: Provided, however, That the holders of all claims, regardless of the manner in which they are evidenced, which are payable without preference out of funds derived from the same source or sources shall be of one class. The holders of claims for the payment of which specific property or revenues are pledged, or which are otherwise given preference as provided by law, shall accordingly constitute a separate class or classes of creditors.

"At the hearing, or a continuance thereof, the judge may refer any matters to a special master for consideration, the taking of testimony, and a report upon special issues, and may allow reasonable compensation for the services performed by such special master, and the actual and necessary expenses incurred in connection with the proceeding, including compensation for services rendered and expenses incurred in obtaining the deposit of securities and the preparation of the plan, whether such work may have been done by the petitioner or by committees or other representatives of creditors, and may allow reasonable compensation for the attorneys or agents of any of the foregoing: Provided, however, That no fees, compensation, reimbursement, or other allowances for attorneys, agents, committees, or other representatives of creditors shall be assessed against the petitioner or paid from any revenues, property, or funds of the petitioner except in the manner and in such sums, if any, as may be provided for in the plan of composition. An appeal may be taken from any order making such determination or award to the United States circuit court of appeals for the circuit in which the proceeding under this chapter is pending, independently of other appeals which may be taken in the proceeding, and such appeal shall be heard summarily.

"On 30 days' notice by any creditor to petitioner, the judge, if he finds that the proceeding has not been prosecuted with reasonable diligence, or that it is unlikely that the plan will be accepted by said proportion of creditors, may dismiss the proceeding."

SEC. 3. Section 83 (e) of chapter IX of such act as amended is amended to read as follows:

"(e) Before concluding the hearing, the judge shall carefully examine all of the contracts, proposals, acceptances, deposit agreements, and all other papers relating to the plan, specifically for the purpose of ascertaining if the fiscal agent, attorney, or other person, firm, or corporation promoting the composition, or doing anything of such a nature, has been or is to be compensated, directly or indirectly, by both the petitioner and the creditors thereof, or any of such creditors—either by fee, commission, or other similar payment, or by transfer or exchange of bonds or other evidence of indebtedness whereby a profit could accrue—and shall take evidence under oath to make certain whether or not any such practice obtains or might obtain.

"After such examination the judge shall make an adjudication of this issue, as a separate part of his interlocutory decree, and if it be found that any such practice be possible, he shall forthwith dismiss the proceeding and tax all of the costs against such fiscal agent, attorney, or other person, firm, or corporation promoting the composition, or doing anything of such a nature, or against the petitioner, unless such plan be modified within the time to be allowed by the judge so as to eliminate the possibility of any such practice, in which event the judge may proceed to further consideration of the confirmation of the plan. If it be found that no such practice is possible, then the judge may proceed to further consideration of the confirmation of the plan.

"At the conclusion of the hearing, the judge shall make written findings of fact and his conclusions of law thereon, and shall enter an interlocutory decree confirming the plan if satisfied that (1) it is fair, equitable, and for the best interests of the creditors and does not discriminate unfairly in favor of any creditor or class of creditors; (2) complies with the provisions of this chapter; (3) has been accepted and approved as required by the provisions of subdivision (d) of this section; (4) all amounts to be paid by the petitioner for services or expenses incident to the composition have been fully disclosed and are reasonable; (5) the offer of the plan and its acceptance are in good faith; and (6) the petitioner is authorized by law to take all action necessary to be taken by it to carry out the plan. If not so satisfied, the judge shall enter an order dismissing the proceeding.

"Before a plan is confirmed, changes and modifications may be made therein, with the approval of the judge after hearing upon such notice to creditors as the judge may direct, subject to the right of any creditor who shall previously have accepted the plan to withdraw his acceptance, within a period to be fixed by the judge and after such notice as the judge may direct, if, in the opinion of the judge, the change or modification will be materially adverse to the interest of such creditor, and if any creditor having such right of withdrawal shall not withdraw within such period, he shall be deemed to have accepted the plan as changed or modified: Provided, however, That the plan as changed or modified shall comply with all the provisions of this chapter and shall have been accepted in writing by the petitioner. Either party may appeal from the interlocutory decree as in equity cases. In case said interlocutory decree shall prescribe a time within which any action is to be taken, the running of such time shall be suspended in case of an appeal until final determination thereof. In case said decree is affirmed, the judge may grant such time as he may deem proper for the taking of such action."

SEC. 4. Section 84 of chapter IX of such act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 84. Jurisdiction conferred on any court by section 81 shall not be exercised by such court after June 30, 1942, except in respect of any proceeding initiated by filing a petition under section 83 (a) on or prior to June 30, 1942."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, this bill, H. R. 9139, is a simple bill. It seeks to amend the Municipal Bankruptcy Act by extending it for 2 years from the date of its expiration, which is June 30 of this year, just 2 weeks from today, and also extends the act to cover counties. In addition, the bill sets up safeguards for the protection of bondholders against improper practices on the part of fiscal agents engaged in refinancing and readjusting obligations of governmental subdivisions.

The necessity for the Municipal Bankruptcy Act was recognized in 1933 and the bill was originally passed at that time. As passed the bill included counties. However, in 1936 the Supreme Court declared the Municipal Bankruptcy Act unconstitutional.

In the Seventy-fifth Congress the bill was redrafted and when it went to the Supreme Court again, in the Bekins case, it was declared constitutional. When the bill was redrafted counties were not placed in the redrafted bill; however, there was no legal reason for removing counties from the bill. It is just as legal if it includes counties as if it does not. This is recognized by all.

The necessity for this legislation is pressing. There are instances, especially in the South, in which as many as 95 percent of the holders of securities of a municipality or other governmental subdivision have agreed to readjust their obligations, but because of the refusal of the small minority of holders of bonds to join with the great majority, it is impossible to readjust the outstanding obligations.

Mr. Speaker, extensive hearings were held before the bankruptcy subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee and the bill was drawn in its present form and reported favorably by the Committee on the Judiciary. No minority report was filed, but one of the members of the committee, the distinguished gentleman from Michigan, is opposed to the bill.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MICHENER. Does the gentleman state that I am the only member of the committee opposed to the bill?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I am not aware of any others. There may be others, but I am not aware of them.

At any rate, the situation is that within 2 weeks this law will expire, and if it does it will work a tremendous hardship on the municipalities which are now seeking to readjust their obligations and upon the counties which are seeking to take advantage of the provisions of this bill. All that this does, Mr. Speaker, is to put the bill, so far as concerns the governmental subdivisions covered, in the same form in which it was originally passed by the House.

The Congress has subscribed to the philosophy of municipal bankruptcy, and that is not an issue before us at this time. Personally, I have no interest in bankruptcy for municipalities or counties, because I come from a State which has a constitutional provision prohibiting the State from borrowing any money.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 1 additional minute.

Mr. Speaker, because of the crying necessity and need for this bill, its enactment is urged at this time. The gentleman from Michigan, who will address you, a gentleman for whom we have the highest regard, has expressed himself as opposed to the philosophy of municipal bankruptcy. I submit that is not the issue at this time. The Congress has subscribed to the philosophy of municipal bankruptcy. It is on the books, and this bill merely extends it for 2 years. It does not make the proposal a permanent part of our law, but simply extends the act for 2 years in order to enable these counties and municipalities which are seeking to take advantage of it to have the opportunity of doing what it is necessary for them to do in order to take advantage of it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may require.

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] has stated in a general way the purposes of this proposed legislation. However, at the risk of repeating, I shall amplify a little.

This bill, H. R. 9139, does three things:

First. The present municipal bankruptcy law expires on June 30, 1940, and this bill would extend that law until June 30, 1942, a period of 2 years.

Second. It penalizes unethical, dishonest, and racketeering methods now possible and which have been practiced in some instances under the existing law.

Third. It establishes as a policy of government the right of counties and parishes to avail themselves of the provisions of the municipal bankruptcy law to the same extent as is accorded to municipalities, such as drainage, reclamation, water, irrigation, and other agricultural improvement districts, local improvement districts, paving districts, and municipal corporations generally. This bill will provide bankruptcy shelter for counties which want to escape being held to their bonded obligations.

The original Municipal Bankruptcy Act was enacted in 1934. Up to that time the Congress had never seriously considered passing a law that would permit municipalities to repudiate or be relieved from performing the terms of their written contracts as expressed in bonds issued by the municipality. In 1934 the country was in an emergency. Overexpansion and bond-salesmen technique had made it possible for many municipalities and even some counties to sell to a credulous and unsuspecting public municipal bonds that never were warranted from a sound economic standpoint. As an emergency measure and with a definite date of expiration, the municipal bankruptcy law was enacted. This innovation in legislative policy was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States and, as stated in the report of the committee—

The Supreme Court of the United States on May 25, 1936, in the case of Ashton v. Cameron County Water Improvement District No. 1 (298 U. S. 513 56 Sup. Ct. 892; 80 L. ed. 1309), held the original Municipal Bankruptcy Act to be unconstitutional as an invasion of the sovereignty of the States. In the Seventy-fifth Congress another municipal bankruptcy law was enacted by the Congress, and on April 25, 1938, the Supreme Court of the United States in U. S. v. Bekins (304 U. S. 27; Sup. Ct. 811; 82 L. ed. 1137) held the said municipal bankruptcy law to be constitutional.

The original law, as it passed the Congress, contained the word "counties" along with other municipalities. The Judiciary Committee, in its effort to avoid unconstitutionality in its rewrite of the law in the Seventy-fifth Congress, eliminated counties. This was done because the Ashton-Cameron case raised serious doubt in the minds of the Judiciary Committee as to whether a law including counties would be held constitutional.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALTER. Certainly the gentleman is not taking the position that the Supreme Court nullified the original Municipal Bankruptcy Act because counties were included?

Mr. MICHENER. I am a member of the subcommittee on bankruptcy and I have been since its inception. I have gone through this very thoroughly. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is a member of the Committee on the Judiciary also, and the gentleman knows well that the word "counties" was left out of the rewrite because we wanted to make the law constitutional, and we did not want any question about it. The Ashton-Cameron case suggested the doubt. There was some question. For instance, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS] took the position at that time—and he was the only member of the committee who did—that we should omit counties, out of an abundance of caution, but I never took that position and I do not believe the majority of the committee, including the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN], took that position at that time.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN rose.

Mr. MICHENER. I do not want to misrepresent my very able and courteous friend. I will yield just for a question.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN. Does the gentleman mean to advise the House that either the Bekins decision or the Ashton-Cameron decision held that the inclusion of the word "counties" affected the constitutionality of this act?

Mr. MICHENER. No. The Ashton-Cameron case—the case holding the original law unconstitutional—was based on the ground that political subdivisions—as the committee understood the decision—could not go through bankruptcy, and certainly a county is a political subdivision of a State. The decision did not mention counties, however.

Later there were some changes in the personnel of the Supreme Court, and when the municipal-bankruptcy law came up for another hearing, the Court in the Bekins case sustained the law. I believe that decision is broad enough to include counties. I am convinced after a careful study of the last opinion—and I believe the Reconstruction Finance Corporation attorneys are also so satisfied—that that opinion is broad enough so that if counties want to go through bankruptcy they may do so, and if States want to go through bankruptcy they may go through bankruptcy, so far as the Constitution is concerned. The advisability of the policy is a matter to be determined by Congress.

I do not believe that this Congress wants to establish any such policy.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHORT. If we continue to squander two dollars for every one dollar we take in, how much longer will it be before we will have to extend this law not only to the counties and the States but to the Nation as a whole?

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield just for a question?

Mr. MICHENER. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska for a question.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN. I might observe that the gentleman who just interrupted the gentleman from Michigan filed a letter with the committee asking it to report this bill favorably to the House.

Mr. SHORT. I am in favor of it because it has been thrust upon us, not by choice.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PIERCE. Will this include school districts, drainage districts, and irrigation districts?

Mr. MICHENER. Drainage districts, school districts, cities, or municipalities are all included under the present law. I am perfectly willing that this law should be continued for a period of 2 years "as is," but I am unwilling to extend the law to include counties and, possibly, a little later, as has been suggested, we will be asked to include States.

Whether or not the Congress should encourage counties to avail themselves of the doubtful privilege of bankruptcy is not a new question. There is no general demand for any such innovation coming from the country. There are possibly two or three counties in Florida where there might be some justification for such a law. General law enacted to meet specific cases is usually unwholesome. Indeed, one of the Representatives in this body from my own State of Michigan has called attention to the fact that there is one county in his congressional district which borrowed more money than it should have borrowed, which enjoys the benefits of sewers, drains, and highways, for which it is burdensome to pay. This Member of Congress has some constituents who feel that if that county could only go through bankruptcy, then its debt would be reduced, its taxes lowered, and its people relieved of a financial burden. Well, now, I am familiar with that great county in Michigan, and it never will and never should go through bankruptcy. It has the power to tax; it has much taxable property. It is a great industrial county, and I cannot believe that its citizens would vote, even though they were given an opportunity, to escape payment of their honest county debt and, as a result, bring want, suffering, and distress to the people who trusted the county and loaned their money to the county, and had faith in the integrity of the county. What I say for this county in Michigan should stand for every county in the United States.

Now, this bill would not be before the Congress were it not for the insistence and perseverence, I might say, of some fiscal agents of municipalities operating in Florida. It is interesting to note how this particular bill got before the Congress. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. REED], a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, introduced a bill amending the municipal bankruptcy law in one minor particular. This was a proper amendment, was unanimously agreed to by the committee, and unanimously passed the House. When it got into the Senate there was engrafted upon it a bill providing for the continuation of the municipal bankruptcy law for a period of 2 years, extending that law to include counties and materially changing the method of securing the consent of the 51 percent of the bondholders before a plan of refinancing could be submitted to the court. The chief proponent of this bill, and especially of the last provision, was Krummer & Co., the fiscal agent of numerous municipalities and counties in Florida. Extensive hearings were held by the Judiciary Subcommittee. It would be enlightening if the people of Florida might read those hearings and know just what this particular fiscal agent has been doing to some of the bondholders, as well as the municipalities it represents in Florida.

To say that its practices were unethical is putting it mildly. In short, the fiscal agent was employed by the municipality to work out its financial problems. In other words, to get as much reduction as possible or more favorable terms, if possible, by which the municipality might liquidate its indebtedness. For this service the fiscal agent was to receive a stipulated compensation. Being thus employed to get the best deal possible for the municipality, this same fiscal agent then sought the bondholder who had loaned the money to the municipality. It then got a written contract with the unsuspecting bondholder, by the terms of which the bondholder agreed to pay the fiscal agent a specified compensation for getting as much money as the fiscal agent could out of the municipality to apply on the bonded debt. The municipality was at one end, the bondholder at the other end, while the fiscal agent was in the middle, collecting tribute from both ends. Now, it just does not seem right that things like this should be permitted to happen. Specific instances were shown where it was claimed the fiscal agent received as much as 20 percent of the amount of the bonds for getting the bondholder and the municipality together; that is, if a widow up in my district bought a bond of one of these municipalities in Florida and paid $100 for the bond, and then the municipality defaulted and did not pay interest for some time, in the compromise the widow might get $80 and the fiscal agent $20 out of the transaction. The municipality was but little better off and the bondholder—the widow—really took the count.

Mr. CANNON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. CANNON of Florida. If the statement the gentleman has just made has been true, is it not also true that the bill now under consideration corrects and forms quite an inhibition against that practice?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes; the gentleman from Florida is correct. The Judiciary Committee was so shocked at such conduct on the part of this particular fiscal agent that it has written into the pending bill a drastic provision, the purpose of which is to prevent any fraud, graft, unfair or unethical practice in the future. I have no hesitancy in saying that certain fiscal agents in Florida are making a genuine racket out of the municipal bankruptcy law, and were it not for the provision in this bill, and if counties were included, the pastures would be just that much greener for unscrupulous fiscal agents.

Now, I am in nowise reflecting upon the splendid gentleman from Florida [Mr. CANNON], who introduced this bill. He knew not whereof he spoke when he endorsed the original bill. Just as soon as the hearings developed the facts as they are, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CANNON] did not push that provision of the bill further. I am in nowise criticizing any one of the fine gentlemen who represent Florida in the House. I am sure that none of them would be a party to any unethical practice on the part of any fiscal agent or anybody else. However, ofttimes these fiscal agents pursue devious routes their wonders to perform and it takes an expert to interpret and understand the ramifications of their transactions.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. I yield.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I am sure the gentleman wants to be fair, as he always does——

Mr. MICHENER. Surely.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. And certainly the gentleman is not indicating to the House that under the bill, as it has been reported by the Judiciary Committee, such a practice could possibly obtain?

Mr. MICHENER. I thought I had made that clear. However, if there is any doubt, I repeat that the pending bill contains a provision attempting to outlaw and prevent in the future the practices which this fiscal agent has been indulging in.

I am endorsing the good features of this bill. I want the bill to come up under the rule which was granted for its consideration. If that is done, amendments to the bill will be in order and a vote can be had on whether or not this House wants to establish as legislative policy the right of counties to go through bankruptcy. Under this suspension of the rules, those favoring the bill can talk for 20 minutes and those opposing the bill can talk for 20 minutes, and then the House must vote "yes" or "no" without reading the bill for amendment. This is the most rigid kind of "gag" rule and those Members who are opposed to "gag" rules certainly can find no justification in voting for this suspension.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. I yield to the gentleman, who is a member of the committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think my distinguished colleague has made a very splendid statement and may I ask him this question: If an extension should be made under this law to include counties, what effect would it have on the sale of county bonds generally?

Mr. MICHENER. Municipal bonds have always stood on a little higher plane than the average corporation bond. The average corporation bond is based upon the security and soundness of the corporation, its management, and the probability that the corporation will be able to meet the interest and the bond when due. A municipal bond is based upon the integrity of government. No county ever has sufficient assets to make it possible for the bondholder to foreclose on the property of the county and realize on its security. It is the right that the county or the municipality has to levy a tax that makes the municipal bond attractive. If the Congress, through this legislation, announces to the world that counties are to be permitted to incur as much debt as they possibly can, get their roads built, their drains constructed, their pavements completed, their county buildings erected, and then refuse to levy taxes to repay those who in good faith have loaned them the money, then I say the country is reaching a new low so far as financial integrity is concerned. The municipal-bond market must necessarily suffer.

The time has come when our Government, our municipalities, and our people should begin to think about paying their debts rather than creating more debts, which must mean repudiation or bankruptcy. Maybe my notions along this line belong to the "horse and buggy" age. Yet there are some things about the "horse and buggy" age worthy of emulation and not least among these things is the old virtue of common honesty. This may sometimes mean hardship and sacrifice. Why, the committee was informed that in Florida they have a $5,000 homestead tax exemption, and we all know that Florida has constitutional provisions making that State a refuge for wealthy persons who want to escape as much taxation as possible while they live, and contribute as little estate tax as possible when they die. Now, where a county has borrowed money and made improvements, and then goes through bankruptcy, the fellow who paid for the improvements gets no benefit at all from the improvements, yet in many cases pays for most of them.

I realize that much propaganda has been put on in favor of this bill. There is some justification for continuing the present law for a period of 2 years. Under this procedure there is no chance to separate the good from the bad—no chance to amend. I therefore hope that this suspension will be voted down and then that the bill will be brought up in a form whereby it may be perfected and an opportunity given to make this legislation represent the will of what I believe to be a majority of this House.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend the remarks I made this afternoon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CANNON], the author of the bill.

Mr. CANNON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I regret that the very fine gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] saw fit to so indulge himself in his presentation of this case. I remember well having been called on to fight for this legislation as the author of the bill as best I could before the committee, that there were other States besides Florida definitely and unqualifiedly interested in this legislation, and for your information, and regardless of what my predecessor in speech has said I say to you that from California the Irrigation District Association of California, A. L. Cowell, Stockton, Calif., attorney, wrote to me, and from Illinois the Florida Tropical Acres, Inc., and from Ohio the Ohio Municipal Council, from Cleveland, Ohio. Then it was that I heard from the law firm of Wood and Cooke, attorneys, of Billings, Mont., and also from Missouri, North Carolina, Nebraska, Minnesota, Indiana, Kansas, Texas, Alabama, and Virginia.

That, I assure you, Mr. Speaker, is not a Florida picture. I am sorry that the gentleman so indulged himself. I attended the same hearings every day that he did. I worked just as hard as the good gentleman did, and his statement was not a true case and it was indeed prejudicial in this matter. I am sorry to call your attention to that, but in the interest of fairness I must. Those are the facts.

In my home county, if you please, the county of Dade, our bonds are selling at a premium, but representing, as I do, 9 counties, I find that at least 6 of those counties have been pauperized in the past, during the years of 1924 and 1925 because of the boom. I have found further, and so has the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER], that 40 States in this Union enjoy the citizenship of the owners of these bonds. This is not a State proposition. It is a general proposition, given rise to by the infiltration of many peoples and many interests during the Florida boom.

This particular case is brought about in this manner: It has been our experience in the resettling and refunding of our bonded indebtedness in Florida that 95 percent of those people invariably have come in and agreed to an amicable settlement and agreement. There have been religiously and constantly some 5 percent of those people who have refused an agreement, residing as they do in the 40 States of this Union. Those people bought those bonds at anywhere from 10 to 30 cents on the dollar and today they hold out for dollar-for-dollar settlement. In many cases, of course, some of the people were representing local residents in Florida.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Florida. I yield.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] said there were about three counties in the State interested in this matter. My interest in it is because I have had telegrams from county commissioners from more than three counties in my district and telegrams from city commissioners and bankers and others who are interested in this matter.

Mr. THORKELSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Florida. I yield.

Mr. THORKELSON. The gentleman mentioned Billings, Mont. That is not in my district. It is in the Second District of Montana. Have they made a request? Are they on the verge of bankruptcy?

Mr. CANNON of Florida. Let me answer your question. Wood and Cook, attorneys of Billings, had this to say:

> I am very much interested in this measure (H. R. 9139), as are many people in this western country, and I presume that such is the case in Florida. The bill should certainly be enacted into law.

That is signed by that firm of lawyers.

Mr. THORKELSON. He did not infer that his county was on the verge of bankruptcy?

Mr. CANNON of Florida. I have read just what he said in respect to this legislation. In one county in my district we have a situation like this: The assessed valuation of the county is only one-third of its bonded indebtedness. Those people are just as honest and just as able in the management of their affairs as other people throughout this country, and the fact that this county and similar counties which I represent find themselves in financial straits is because we of Florida, during the boom which visited itself upon us in 1925, were called upon to expand and improve to take care of the influx of the citizenry from other States. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein a letter written by myself and several other brief excerpts from papers and documents.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

By unanimous consent, Mr. CARLSON was granted permission to revise and extend his own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD.

MUNICIPAL BANKRUPTCY

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. REED of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, sometimes individuals are unfortunate in the names that their parents have selected for them. Sometimes statutes are enacted by legislative bodies and they suffer similarly from misnomer. I think that applies to the statute which we at this time seek to amend.

When most of us think about bankruptcy we think about a proceeding wherein a person comes into court and, to relieve himself of his debts, he surrenders his property, takes his legal exemptions, and then says to his creditors, "Divide up what is left."

The statute which is in force at the present time and which we know as the Municipal Bankruptcy Act has been and is misnamed. It should be the Municipal Compositions Act. There is a great deal of difference between bankruptcy and composition. The Constitution of the United States mentions the word "bankruptcy" in the powers of Congress, and this is a very broad term. It has been construed in the following words:

> Congress shall have the power to establish uniform laws on the subject of any person's general inability to pay his debts throughout the United States (Kunzler v. Kohaus, 5 Hill, 317, 321).

Composition acts under the bankruptcy statute are different than ordinary benefit acts. They have been described by our Supreme Court as proceedings—

> Voluntary on both sides, by which the debtor of his own motion offers to pay his creditors a certain percentage of their claims in exchange for relief from his liabilities. The amount there may be less or more than would be realized from a distribution in bankruptcy. For the purpose of the composition all the creditors are treated as partners, and the will of the majority is enforced upon the minority, provided the decision of the majority is approved by the court (Continental Illinois Bank & Trust Co. v. Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Co., 294 U. S. 648).

In case a municipality wishes to avail itself of the benefits of the present law, it does not come in solely on its own motion, but when it files its petition in the court it presents thereto a plan of composition acceptable to 51 percent of the aggregate amount of the securities affected by the plan, who must join in the petition. The whole matter is then submitted to the court, who, after due notice to all parties in interest, may, after a hearing, confirm or modify the same and then enter an order for the composition of the debts, provided 66⅔ percent of the aggregate amount of the securities affected by the plan agree thereto. So it is not similar to an ordinary bankruptcy case.

It has been said by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER], or at least intimated by him, that this legislation had its inception in Florida and that Florida is the State mostly interested therein. Let me say that about a year ago the American Bar Association met in convention at San Francisco. At that time they took up the proposition of whether or not legislation ought to be passed to continue this so-called municipal bankruptcy act in force. In order to inform their members they sent to the various clerks of the district courts throughout the United States to get data in support thereof. From that data compiled a year ago it was found that 159 suits for municipal bankruptcy were then pending in district courts throughout the United States. The 159 cases were broken down as follows: 2 from Arizona, 14 from Arkansas, 8 from California, 30 from Florida, 25 from Indiana, 48 from Kentucky, 1 from Michigan, 2 from Missouri, 2 from New Jersey, 1 from North Carolina, 2 from Oklahoma, 9 from Michigan, 1 from South Carolina, 2 from Tennessee, and 12 from Texas.

Likewise at that time there had been in 17 States of the Union a total of 102 cases that had been disposed of and there were 3 cases then pending on appeal. The committee on constitutional and practical problems arising from the Municipal Debt Readjustment Act of the Federal Government in its report to the American Bar Association at San Francisco said, in part, that the so-called Municipal Bankruptcy Act "has served a useful purpose to date and since it is likely that the wreckage of the depression cannot be cleared away entirely by June 30, 1940, the act itself should be extended for another 2-year period."

The Chicago Bar Association has also quite recently petitioned the Congress to extend this act for 2 more years.

Mr. Speaker, it is admitted by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] that, excluding the provision including counties and parishes, the bill before us today is an improvement on the present law. If since 1937, it has been invoked in 264 instances in over 20 States and has the commendation of the largest and most conservative of the associations of lawyers in America, I see no reason why its benefits should not be extended to counties and parishes and the act itself continued in force for 2 additional years.

CREATION OF MOUNTAIN DISTRICT, STATE OF TENNESSEE

Mr. SMITH of Virginia, from the Committee on Rules, presented the following privileged resolution for printing under the rule, which was read, referred to the House Calendar, and ordered printed:

House Resolution 530

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 1681, an act to amend section 107 of the Judicial Code to create a mountain district in the State of Tennessee, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary, the bill shall be read for amendments under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

MUNICIPAL BANKRUPTCY

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS].

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate the attention of my colleagues over here, my colleagues on the Republican side.

Mr. Speaker, the narrow issue presented here is whether the widows and orphans to whom our good friend from Michigan referred shall get nothing or something.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. HOBBS. I am always happy to yield to my friend from Michigan.

Mr. MICHENER. On what does the gentleman base that positive statement?

Mr. HOBBS. I base that positive statement on this: That ever since the Florida boom burst they have received practically nothing. Under this bill they will get something, and I will proceed to show you how.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HOBBS. I would like to proceed, but I cannot refuse the request of my friend from Missouri.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. I want to make a brief observation.

Mr. HOBBS. I have but 4 minutes.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. But I have had some experience in refinancing levy and drainage districts. I have known a group of highjackers to go out and buy a few bonds and prevent a settlement when a majority wanted to settle; and the highjackers forced them to pay the face amount, 100 cents on the dollar, while the other men did not take the amount agreed upon.

Mr. HOBBS. To prevent such highjacking is one of the purposes of this bill. And then I want to say just this, and if you forget everything else, please remember this one fact. Florida has not asked for one dollar of reduction in the face amount of her outstanding municipal bonds. There has not been a single refinancing operation under this bill, not one, that did not give dollar for dollar of principal. There has not been a single case in which the bonds were not refinanced at par—par for par. Think that over. It is the truth, according to the evidence undisputed before our committee. The only benefit Florida cities have received under this law is reduced interest rates—some of them from 8 percent—down to a reasonable rate. The new refunding bonds bear interest, in some instances as low as 2 or 2½ percent, for the first year or so, but it comes right on back up to 4, 5, and 6 percent over a period of years. Floridians were no more to blame for overbonding than the speculators from other States who participated in that folly, and in many cases induced it. Yet not one of the municipalities of Florida "welched" as to principal.

They simply overestimated their ability to pay, thinking that the boom would be permanent. They are not blameless, but they should not be criticized too harshly. They have come clean. All they ask is a scaling down of interest so that they can pay.

That is a good record.

The same, in the main, may be said in behalf of the other debtors who have sought some relief under this law.

There is no logical reason to deny counties that are in the same predicament as the cities and drainage and irrigation districts are the same relief and hope.

This bill stops the only real complaint against this law—double payment to fiscal agents.

Defeat this bill and let the law expire, and you kill the only chance which that widow for whom the gentleman from Michigan pleads has of getting more than what the little boy shot at with his new rifle—nothing. Pass it, and she gets full face value, plus some interest.

This law seeks to solve a real problem. It faces facts. Mandamus ordering increased taxes when the old taxes have not been and cannot be paid, is a vain procedure. It produces nothing.

Bonds were issued during the boom. The boom burst. Now there is not a Chinaman's chance to pay in any other way than to give them an extension at a reduced interest rate, then they will pay dollar for dollar, par for par on the bonds that were issued, if we give them time and a chance.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBBS. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. In the first place, they had an unparalleled boom, then an unparalleled depression?

Mr. HOBBS. That is right. This is the only chance for the widow in Michigan to get her money back. This is a good bill, a fair bill. It should be passed.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. A rule was granted on this bill and is now pending. If this motion to suspend the rules is voted down, then the bill will be eligible for consideration under the rule which permits amendments to strike out the word "county"; is that not true?

Mr. RAYBURN. It may be true, and it may not be true.

Mr. MICHENER. Well, the Speaker probably knows.

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not know whether the rule will be called up or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair presumes also that the gentleman from Michigan would know.

The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MICHENER) there were—ayes 103, noes 46.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 223, nays 100, not voting 108, as follows:

The SPEAKER. Without objection, House Resolution 468 will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION AND STOCK OF FEDERAL HOME-LOAN BANKS

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 9958) to authorize the purchase by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of stock of Federal home-loan banks; to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto. I may say there is no substantial change in these amendments which would justify a conference.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL]?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I object at this time because I am not acquainted with the amendments.

Mr. STEAGALL. I may say that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD], the gentlewoman from Illinois [Miss SUMNER], and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER] have examined the amendments.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I will ask the gentleman to let that go over until the morning.

Mr. STEAGALL. They are all perfectly agreeable.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I am not sure of the amendments and I will ask the gentleman to withhold his request until tomorrow.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the request.

ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS] is unavoidably detained. Had he been here he would have voted "yea" on the resolution just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri has raised a question with reference to such announcements.

The Chair has consulted the decisions of three or four former Speakers, and the precedents are all uniform to the effect that it is improper practice to make such announcements. The gentleman from Missouri has notified the Chair that he will object to all such statements, and the Chair trusts therefore that the gentleman will withdraw his request.

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the request.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an excerpt from a recent speech by the President.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GOSSETT]?

There was no objection.

MAKING THE WORLD SAFER FOR DEMOCRACY

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GOSSETT]?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, this Nation must immediately prepare mentally, morally, and physically to deal with the present emergency and also with possible future emergencies. Today's defeat of the great French democracy by the force of dictators' arms makes evident the necessity that we respond at once to President Roosevelt's plea for rapid production of essential war materials and supplies.

Dictators laugh at democracy. They scoff at democratic efficiency and at democratic ideals. The time has come when the home of democracy must speak with strength as well as with principles. The voice of America henceforth and forever must not only be a voice of justice but also a voice of authority, based upon indomitable strength and power.

No one has better expressed the grave concern of our great liberty-loving Republic than its farsighted, courageous, President in delivering his national-defense message to the Congress on May 16, at which time he said in part:

> These are ominous days—days whose swift and shocking developments force every neutral nation to look to its defenses in the light of new factors. The brutal force of modern offensive war has been loosed in all its horror. New powers of destruction, incredibly swift and deadly, have been developed, and those who wield them are ruthless and daring. No old defense is so strong that it requires no further strengthening, and no attack is so unlikely or impossible that it may be ignored.
> Let us examine, without self-deception, the dangers which confront us. Let us measure our strength and our defense without self-delusion.
> The clear fact is that the American people must recast their thinking about national protection.
> Surely the developments of the past few weeks have made it clear to all of our citizens that the possibility of attack on vital American zones ought to make it essential that we have the physical, the ready ability to meet those attacks and to prevent them from reaching their objectives.
> This means military implements—not on paper—which are ready and available to meet any lightning offensive against our American interest. It means also that facilities for production must be ready to turn out munitions and equipment at top speed.
> We have had the lesson before us over and over again—nations that were not ready and were unable to get ready found themselves overrun by the enemy.

Mr. Speaker, we need more action and less words. We should start now. Before the sun goes down we should sign proper contracts with Henry Ford and have him begin tomorrow with his program to produce 1,000 airplanes per day. We should immediately begin to utilize the tremendous industrial, scientific, and human resources of this country and continue at top speed until no power on earth can challenge the strength of American arms. Our world must be made unsafe for robber barons to stalk their helpless prey.

But it is not enough simply to prepare for war. We must also prepare for peace. The responsibility for world leadership has already fallen upon our shoulders. We may shortly become the only oasis of liberty remaining in a mad, fear-crazed, war-torn world. We must keep the torch of freedom burning until the tear-dimned eyes of suffering and enslaved millions can again catch the gleam. With clear heads and steady hands, we must help to rebuild a decent world order. We must take the lead in the peace that has to follow after the war.

To the isolationists, we cite all human history, both sacred and profane. On almost the first page of sacred history the Almighty taught Cain that unforgettable truth that he had some very definite responsibilities for his brother's welfare. Those persons who care not what happens to others so long as it does not happen to them are either depraved in mind or in intellect, or in both.

Self-interest as well as concern for humanity requires that we preserve, protect, and defend democracy. This challenge should find ready response in the heart of every American who is worthy of his heritage.

Notwithstanding our professions of high principle, however, our record in the past decade has been none too good. We should blush with shame to think that more than 2,000,000 Chinese have been killed and more than 40,000,000 made homeless largely through the use of American scrap iron and gasoline. We have no right to threaten aggressors with one hand and aid them with the other. We should remember that economic sanctions are often more potent than military sanctions. Our economic power should be used to aid defenseless peoples and to defeat aggressors. We should not aid in the commission of crime by knowingly selling supplies to the criminal.

Mr. Speaker, it has been said with some truth, it seems to me, that politics destroyed America's leadership in the peace that followed the first World War. If this be true, let us pray that history does not repeat itself following this second World War.

If more of us lived for our country, fewer of us would have to die for our country.

Let all of us who love America rededicate ourselves to those principles that gave her birth and happiness. Let us resolve that henceforth, whether in peace or in war, we will devote to her service the best that we possess of mind and heart, with the hope that divine Providence will guide our feet in the paths of peace.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the subject of S. 3237, the sugar bill which we had before us today for consideration, and to include certain communications and tables.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY]?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include two letters from the Secretary of Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOOK]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROOKS asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein some resolutions passed by citizens of my district with reference to the international situation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON]?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLAYPOOL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein an article by Hon. Louis Johnson.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute to make an announcement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, there are a number of Members on the Republican side who want to appear before the resolutions committee of the Republican National Convention on foreign affairs to urge an antiwar plank. The resolutions committee, headed by Mr. Hyde, of Oklahoma, will hold hearings this Wednesday evening, June 19, in the Bellevue-Stratford Hotel, on the eighteenth floor. Republican Members of Congress who want to appear then on the foreign-affairs plank will be welcome at any time from 8 o'clock to midnight to make any statement they wish to on that subject. Mr. O. G. Saxon, the secretary of the committee, can be reached at room 524, Bellevue-Stratford Hotel, at Philadelphia.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Not for a facetious remark.

Mr. HOBBS. I wanted to inquire in what city those hearings would be held.

Mr. FISH. The City of Brotherly Love, Philadelphia.

[Here the gavel fell.]

NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. HARTER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to recommit to the committee of conference the bill (H. R. 9850) to expedite the strengthening of the national defense.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. TALLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein an address delivered by Col. Hanford MacNider at Des Moines, Iowa.

SENATE

TUESDAY, JUNE 18, 1940

(Legislative day of Tuesday, May 28, 1940)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Lord of all power and might, who hast set a restlessness in our hearts and hast made us all seekers after that unto which we cannot fully attain: Forbid that we should be satisfied with what we have made of life, but do Thou guide us in every choice, making us humble, brave, and loving.

We do not ask that Thou wilt keep us safe, but that Thou wilt keep us loyal to the ideals of America, and so prepare us for the great adventure in helping to build the City of God in a distracted world. Keep us at tasks too difficult for us, that we may be driven unto Thee for strength. Make us aware of the contentious kingdom within ourselves, which we must learn to rule before we can hope to rule others. Increase our faith in the ultimate triumph of goodness, and help us to realize that each responsibility is but an opportunity to gird ourselves that we may worthily serve our God and our country. Strengthen us with might by Thy Spirit in the inner man, that, Christ dwelling in our hearts by faith, we may be filled with all the fullness of God. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. BARKLEY, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day of Monday, June 17, 1940, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Calloway, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the following bills and joint resolution of the Senate:

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE MARTIN ROBERTS

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the sudden death of Martin Roberts, of the Library of Congress, comes as a shock to his many friends. I have known Mr. Roberts and his brother, David Roberts, who also served for many years in the Library, as public servants of rare insight and most commendable understanding. Mr. Martin Roberts at the time of his death was Chief Assistant Librarian of the Library of Congress. His devotion to the Library and his intense interest in every phase of its development were apparent to all who knew him. He was not a man to seek self-advancement but gave his life completely to the great institution which he served for over 37 years. Mr. David Roberts, of the Prints Division of the Library, was a hymn writer and a poet. These brothers will long be remembered for the dignity, the grace, the charm, and the personal loyalty which they brought to our national institution of learning. Congress has suffered a loss in the passing of these great-hearted public servants.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have included in the RECORD as a part of my remarks an editorial on Martin Arnold Roberts taken from the Washington Evening Star, June 17, 1940.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MARTIN ARNOLD ROBERTS

News of the sudden death of Martin Arnold Roberts has come as a shock to hundreds of public officials, scholars, and others who have had reason to appreciate his endeavors as chief assistant librarian of the Library of Congress.

Mr. Roberts, it must be conceded, was not universally famous, yet it may be wondered if any other servant of the common good in his generation ever more truly deserved the gratitude of the entire national community. The great intelligence, understanding, and sympathy with which he was endowed were dedicated to the development of what is now the most important bibliographic establishment in the world. He lived for the Library from 1903 onward. Those with whom he was intimately asscciated speak of him as "a man of unremitting and self-sacrificing industry," but the words are inadequate. It is necessary to explain that "his workdays were ordinarily 18 hours long; neither Sundays nor holidays nor the usual vacations were permitted to interrupt his labors. His was a career of devoted service which he pursued with an indomitable spirit that never surrendered to fatigue or even took account of the limits of physical endurance." His home was in Baltimore, and it was characteristic of him that he cheerfully commuted daily to Washington during no fewer than 37 years.

Himself a scholar of distinction, an alumnus of Johns Hopkins, Harvard and Columbia Universities, Mr. Roberts cultivated a talent for the giving of exactly that sort of help which research workers require. His authoritative knowledge of books he freely pledged to all who sought his aid. A certain generous enthusiasm stimulated his efforts without disturbing his native modesty and simplicity. Kindliness was his outstanding quality, a humane cooperative faculty his most notable capacity. Nothing else pleased him so much as the privilege of contributing to the completion of a task which he considered worthy of the effort. He was a builder, adding himself and his genius to the expansion of the Library and the advancement of its patrons. His memory assuredly will be treasured by all who care about cultural progress in this earth. As it was declared of Wren at St. Paul's, his monument will be found in the shrine of learning to which he gave his heart.

SUPPLEMENTAL ESTIMATE, LEGISLATIVE ESTABLISHMENT (S. DOC. NO. 216)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the legislative establishment, Senate and House of Representatives, amounting to $30,000, fiscal year 1941, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SUPPLEMENTAL ESTIMATE, DEPARTMENT OF STATE (S. DOC. NO. 217)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the Department of State (Alaskan International Highway Commission), fiscal year 1941, amounting to $15,000, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

APPROPRIATION FOR FOREIGN AIR MAIL TRANSPORTATION (S. DOC. NO. 218)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a proposed provision affecting the appropriation for foreign air mail transportation for the Post Office Department, fiscal year 1941, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SUPPLEMENTAL ESTIMATE, NAVY DEPARTMENT (S. DOC. NO. 219)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the Navy Department, fiscal year 1941, amounting to $6,900, to cover expenses of the Marine Band in attending the convention of the Grand Army of the Republic, to be held at Springfield, Ill., September 8 to 13, 1940, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PROVISION RELATIVE TO APPROPRIATION FOR FEDERAL WORKS AGENCY (S. DOC. NO. 220)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting the draft of a proposed provision pertaining to an existing appropriation for the Federal Works Agency, Public Roads Administration (Mount Vernon Memorial Highway), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. WALSH presented a resolution of the Boston (Mass.) Social Club, protesting against involvement of the United States in foreign wars, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution of the board of directors of the Chamber of Commerce, of Cambridge, Mass., favoring the rendering of material aid to the Allied nations and the adoption of an adequate national-defense program, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the Beverly (Mass.) branch of the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies, praying that the United States render all needed aid to the Allies without impairing American national-defense requirements, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the General Town Committee for National Defense, Brockton, Mass., praying that the United States render material aid to the Allied nations, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Adams, Mass., praying that material aid be rendered the Allied nations, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, a committee of three undergraduates from Michigan State College has brought to Washington petitions praying that our Nation may keep out of war. The petitions are signed by 3,800 students of that college. I ask leave to present the petitions to the Senate for appropriate reference, and request that the body of one of the petitions be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petitions were received and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the body of one of the petitions was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EAST LANSING, MICH.

Three hundred white crosses were put up on our campus last night, dedicated to those who have not yet "died for democracy."

We, the students of Michigan State College, ask that you use your influence to keep our Nation out of war, so that we might live to build our democracy peacefully.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I also present a letter addressed to me by constituents of Kalamazoo, Mich., together with petitions numerously signed by citizens of Kalamazoo and vicinity. I ask that the letter and the body of one of the petitions, without the signatures attached, be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the letter and petitions—without the signatures attached—were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and the body of one of the petitions was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KALAMAZOO, MICH., June 14, 1940.

To the Honorable ARTHUR VANDENBERG,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Enclosed you will find the signatures of but a few of the many people who are aware of the dangerous trend of the present policies of our administration. It seems to us that the voices now heard most loudly in Washington do not reflect the opinions of the majority of our voters.

We would appreciate it greatly if you will give careful consideration to the wishes of the people having signed the enclosed request.

May we also request that you forward these signatures to your colleague, the Honorable PRENTISS BROWN, with the further request that he forward them to our own well-known Congressman, the Honorable PAUL W. SHAFER?

Most sincerely,

YOUR UNDERSIGNED CONSTITUENTS.

To the Honorable ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG, Senator;
To the Honorable PRENTISS BROWN, Senator;
To the Honorable PAUL W. SHAFER, Congressman:

Please use your influence and encourage proper legislation to keep our country out of the present European conflict. We do not favor weakening our own defenses by selling war material and equipment to any foreign nation. We do favor expanding our own defense program. Block the war hysteria.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I have received in the last few days from constituents in Maryland numerous petitions signed by many thousands of people praying that the United States do all it effectively and expediently can to insure the victory of the Allies in the present European conflict, which I now present. The petitions are sponsored by the Maryland committee affiliated with the National Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies—that is the title of the committee. I think the petitions should be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the petitions will be received and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

RESOLUTION OF HOWELL-GRANTHAM POST, NO. 53, AMERICAN LEGION

Mr. BILBO presented a resolution of Howell-Grantham Post, No. 53, American Legion, Lucedale, Miss., which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution deploring the present world crisis, reaffirming our loyalty to the ideals of government that our former Allies are making great sacrifices to maintain, pledging our loyalty to their cause, and urging immediate aid to them by our Government

The following is a resolution unanimously adopted by the Howell-Grantham Post, No. 53, of the American Legion, Lucedale, Miss.

"Feeling that it might be of value in promoting aid to the Allies in their great struggle against Germany, we are sending it to you with the hope that it might cause other American Legion posts and citizens to take the same stand which will result in our Government giving immediate and necessary aid to the Allies as Congress may deem wise:

"Whereas one of the fundamental purposes of the American Legion is to perpetuate and foster the democratic ideals of government that have been maintained by the United States of America during the entire period of its existence, for the promotion of which many sacrifices have been made and for the protection of which the members of this organization, as well as many other loyal citizens of our country, joined with England, France, and the other allied governments in the World War; and

"Whereas the same forces which menaced the peace of the world in the years 1914 to 1918 have again risen in more barbaric and monstrous form, threatening to crush the civilization not only of Europe but of the entire world, and since there is such a strong tie between the citizens of the United States and of England and France, not only by reason of former relationships as defenders of peace but of similarity in forms of government and ideas of peace, it is impossible for this organization to remain inactive and silent while those countries are resisting to a bitter death the preservation of civil liberties, which, if maintained, will greatly benefit us; and

"Whereas we believe if our former Allies lose this great struggle, it will be necessary ultimately for us to fight the same forces that now oppose them, and without their aid; and

"Whereas in making such sacrifices, not only for their benefit but for the entire civilized world, they should be assured not only of our sympathy, our admiration for their bravery and courage, but that every possible aid should be rendered them immediately by our Federal Government before it is too late—the kind of aid to be determined by those in national authority, but some substantial aid without delay: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Howell-Grantham Post, No. 53, of the American Legion, Lucedale, Miss.—

"SECTION 1. That this post of the American Legion definitely affirm its loyalty to the cause of good government which our former Allies are now so courageously defending, and that we condemn with all possible vigor the ferocious, monstrous, and barbaric attempts by Germany to destroy modern civilization, and decry its ruthless practice of destroying human lives.

"SEC. 2. That we dedicate whatever resources we may have for their immediate aid and defense and express our unwillingness to sit idly by with a surplus of food and an inexhaustible supply of metals and ammunitions that can be used by them in defending and establishing the peace of the world.

"SEC. 3. That we pledge our cooperation to the United States Government and to our President, and not only endorse his statement to Congress that we give the Allies first call upon anything material we can produce, but that we go further, and urge that every weapon we possess which is not indispensable to preserve law and order within our own boundaries and not necessary for our immediate defense be made available to them, and that such other aid as in the wisdom of Congress, such as giving credit, furnishing food, medical supplies, and money, be extended, and if necessary delivered.

"SEC. 4. That our services be offered to crush the so-called "fifth column" in this country, as well as to stamp out all non-American, un-American, and disloyal persons and practices that may exist.

"SEC. 5. That this resolution be published as an expression of this post not only as a means of promoting immediate aid to the Allies, but of guaranteeing to those loyal Americans who did not return from the World War that the torch is still held high, and that they are not forgotten, even though a greater battle wages in Flanders Field."

Yours sincerely,

L. L. VISE,
Commander, Howell-Grantham Post, No. 53.

AMENDMENT TO SECOND DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the second deficiency appropriation bill, 1940, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

At the proper place in the bill, to insert the following:

For customs appraiser's warehouse addition at Houston, Tex., $75,000.

SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS FOR NATIONAL DEFENSE—AMENDMENT

Mr. ANDREWS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 10055, making supplemental appropriations for the national defense, and so forth, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

On page 21, to strike out lines 17, 18, and 19, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

"For the Navy for the construction of a water-supply system for the naval station in Key West, Fla., $2,000,000, built either by the Navy, or in cooperation with the State agency, so that Army, Navy, and civilian population may be jointly supplied with an adequate water supply."

JOINT COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE AS TO NUMBERS AND COMPENSATION OF OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES OF CONGRESS

Mr. TYDINGS submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 52), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a joint committee of Congress is hereby created, consisting of three Senators, to be appointed by the Vice President, and three Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House. Any vacancy occurring in the membership of such joint committee shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment.

It shall be the duty of the joint committee to investigate and report to the Congress not later than January 3, 1941, what adjustments, if any, should be made in the numbers and compensation of the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives, including joint committees and other joint services of the two Houses and including any employees under the jurisdiction of the Architect of the Capitol who are not subject to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended.

There is hereby made available, one-half from the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half from the contingent fund of the House, such amount, not in excess of $3,000, as may be required for necessary personnel and expenses of such joint committee.

EXPEDITION IN STRENGTHENING THE NATIONAL DEFENSE—CONFERENCE REPORT WITHDRAWN

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I request that the conference report on the bill (H. R. 9850) to expedite the strengthening of the national defense, submitted by me on the 14th instant, may be withdrawn for further consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

[Mr. DANAHER asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a letter from Philip C. Jessup, published in the Hartford Courant on June 15, 1940, entitled, "This War is Not Yet Our War," which appears in the Appendix.]

OPPOSITION TO PUBLIC OWNERSHIP OF UTILITIES

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I ask to have incorporated in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, a letter which I am writing to the people of my State regarding attacks on public ownership in that State.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEAR FRIEND: History repeats itself. In 1927 private power interests paid the Voters' Information League in our State to try to discredit Seattle City Light. In 1940 the Let the People Vote League has been created by the same interests to cripple public utility districts by passage of initiative 139.

Government reports show Puget Sound Power & Light Co. appropriated $150,000 for expenses of the Voters' Information League. Of this, $25,000 was put up by the National Electric Light Association, propaganda agency of the private power industry.

Today's league is a twin of 1927's league. Use of citizens' committees with catchy titles is an old trick. In our State there was a Washington Committee on Public Utility Information. In California, power companies used the Greater California League and the People's Economy League.

This characteristic strategy is explained in a Stone & Webster letter. I quote: "We, as the company, will not be placed in the position of fighting this situation, there being a strong citizens' committee who will fight it * * *."

Sworn testimony about the Greater California League, as found in Government reports, was that the league "was simply the name under which he (Mr. Cullinan, a power company agent) carried on the campaign and disbursed the funds."

Puget Sound Power & Light Co. admitted under oath it gave $124,000 to the Washington Committee on Public Utility Information in 1930 to fight the district power law which is again being attacked. Washington Water Power Co. spent $33,435 in the same fight, though it did so more openly.

The Federal Government can, and I believe will, find out how much the private power companies are giving the Let the People Vote League. I have asked for an investigation.

The public, so often victimized by private power-company propaganda, should guard against being victimized again. The Federal Trade Commission, after an exhaustive probe that started in the Hoover administration and ended in 1935, declared that private electric utilities had the most extensive and expensive propaganda machine in the country. The Commission quoted a boss of this propaganda mill as boasting that the public pays for its operations * * * and so it does, to the tune of millions of dollars.

Any law sponsored by the private power companies, no matter how plausible it may appear, should be under suspicion. Federal reports tell why.

These reports show the utilities deliberately decided to invade the schools with their propaganda, and did so in our State. This was done in pursuance of a plan originated by the notorious Insulls in Illinois. The scheme was worthy of the sinister brain of the Nazi Goebbels. Like the Nazi propagandist, the utilities adopted lying as a propaganda weapon. The basic Insull strategy, as used in our State was—and I quote the authors—"not to try logic or reason but to try to pin the bolshevik idea on my opponent" * * * make it appear all public ownership advocates are "reds" * * * logic won't work * * * so use lies instead * * * that was the utility policy, and still is.

It was also part of the Insull plan, used in our State—and again I quote—"to cloud the main issue" * * * in other words, lead the public off the track, get the people confused.

The Insull plan also involved use of citizens' committees, use of money to control newspapers, paying authors to write books favorable to the power company viewpoint, controlling public officials, subsidizing teachers, and intimidating businessmen.

Continuing in the traditional manner, the power companies are merely using the Let the People Vote League to disseminate a new and very deceptive argument in favor of initiative 139. That league is advertising that P. U. D. revenue bonds are a general tax obligation; and that P. U. D.'s can now incur unlimited public debt. Both statements are untrue.

Even if initiative 139 were a good measure, its backers yould not have the right to support it by falsehoods. Voters should rebuke such tactics. I hope you use this letter to work against this initiative. And if it isn't too much trouble, will you let me hear from you?

Sincerely yours,

HOMER T. BONE.

REVENUE BILL OF 1940

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10039) to provide for the expenses of national preparedness by raising revenue and issuing bonds, to provide a method for paying for such bonds, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next amendment reported by the committee.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 25, after line 14, to strike out:

"(1) Upon all distilled spirits produced in or imported into the United States upon which the internal-revenue tax imposed by law has been paid, and which on July 1, 1940, are held, by a retail dealer in liquors in a quantity in excess of 100 wine gallons in the aggregate or by any other person in any quantity, and intended for sale or for use in the manufacture or production of any article intended for sale, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a floor-stocks tax of 75 cents on each proof-gallon, and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such proof-gallon.

"(2) Every person required by this subsection to pay any floor-stocks tax, and every retail dealer in liquors, shall, on or before August 1, 1940, under such regulations as the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, shall prescribe, make a return and pay such tax. Payment of the tax shown to be due may be extended to a date not later than February 1, 1941, upon the filing of a bond for payment thereof in such form and amount and with such surety or sureties as the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may prescribe.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

"(1) Upon all distilled spirits produced in or imported into the United States upon which the internal-revenue tax imposed by law has been paid, and which on July 1, 1940, are held and intended for sale or for use in the manufacture or production of any article intended for sale, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a floor stocks tax equal to the sum of the following:

"(A) Seventy-five cents on each proof-gallon, and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such proof-gallon; plus

"(B) Ten cents on each proof-gallon, and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such proof-gallon, in the case of distilled spirits upon which the rectification tax imposed under the internal-revenue laws has been paid, except that such 10-cent rate shall not apply to distilled spirits which are rectified distilled spirits solely by reason of the addition of not more than 2½ percent by volume of coloring, blending, smoothing, or flavoring materials, and shall not apply to liqueurs, cordials, or similar compounds.

"(2) Every person required by this subsection to pay any floor-stocks tax shall, on or befcre August 1, 1940, under such regulations as the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, shall prescribe, make a return and pay such tax. Payment of the tax shown to be due may be extended to a date not later than February 1, 1941, upon the filing of a bond for payment thereof in such form and amount and with such surety or sureties as the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may prescribe.

So as to read:

SEC. 213. Distilled spirits.

(a) Section 2800 of the Internal Revenue Code is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new subsections:

"(g) Defense tax for 5 years: In lieu of the rates of tax specified in such of the sections of this title as are set forth in the following table, the rates applicable with respect to the period after June 30, 1940, and before July 1, 1945, shall be the rates set forth under the heading 'Defense-tax rate':

Section	Description of tax	Old rate	Defense-tax rate
2800 (a) (1)	Distilled spirits generally	$2.25	$3.
2800 (a) (1)	Brandy	$2	$2.75.
2800 (a) (3)	Imported perfumes	$2.25	$3.
2800 (a) (5)	Rectifying	30 cents	40 cents.

"(h) Floor-stocks tax.

"(1) Upon all distilled spirits produced in or imported into the United States upon which the internal-revenue tax imposed by law has been paid, and which on July 1, 1940, are held and intended for sale or for use in the manufacture or production of any article intended for sale, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a floor-stock tax equal to the sum of the following:

"(A) Seventy-five cents on each proof-gallon, and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such proof-gallon; plus

"(B) Ten cents on each proof-gallon, and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such proof-gallon, in the case of distilled spirits upon which the rectification tax imposed under the internal-revenue laws has been paid, except that such 10-cent rate shall not apply to distilled spirits which are rectified distilled spirits solely by reason of the addition of not more than 2½ percent by volume of coloring, blending, smoothing, or flavoring materials, and shall not apply to liqueurs, cordials, or similar compounds.

"(2) Every person required by this subsection to pay any floor-stocks tax shall, on or before August 1, 1940, under such regulations as the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, shall prescribe, make a return and pay such tax. Payment of the tax shown to be due may be extended to a date not later than February 1, 1941, upon the filing of a bond for payment thereof in such form and amount and with such surety or sureties as the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, line 13, before the word "for", to strike out "Super-Tax" and insert "Defense Tax"; in line 14, before the word "for", to strike out "Super-Tax" and insert "Defense Tax"; in line 19, before the word "Rate", to strike out "Super-tax" and insert "Defense-tax"; in the headings of the table, last column, to strike out "Super-tax" and insert "Defense-tax"; in the second line of the table, third column, to strike out "10" and insert "15"; and in the last column, to strike out "12" and insert "18"; in the third line of the table, third column, to strike out "20" and insert "25"; and in the last column, to strike out "24" and insert "30"; and after the sixth regular line in the table, to strike out "3031 (a)—Fortification of wines—10 cents—12 cents", so as to read:

SEC. 214. Wines and fermented malt liquors.

Chapter 26 of the Internal Revenue Code is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new subchapter:

"SUBCHAPTER F—DEFENSE TAX FOR 5 YEARS

"SEC. 3190. Defense tax for 5 years.

"In lieu of the rates of tax specified in such of the sections of this title as are set forth in the following table, the rates applicable with respect to the period after June 30, 1940, and before July 1, 1945, shall be the rates set forth under the heading 'Defense-tax rate':

Section	Description of tax	Old rate	Defense-tax rate
3030 (a) (1) (A)	Still wines	5 cents	6 cents.
3030 (a) (1) (A)	Still wines	15 cents	18 cents.
3030 (a) (1) (A)	Still wines	25 cents	30 cents.
3030 (a) (2)	Sparkling wines	2½ cents	3 cents.
3030 (a) (2)	Sparkling wines	1¼ cents	1½ cents.
3030 (a) (2)	Liqueurs, cordials, etc	1¼ cents	1½ cents.
3150 (a)	Fermented malt liquors	$5	$6.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, line 6, after the word "person", to strike out the comma and "other than a retail dealer," and in line 9, after the numerals "3190" and the period, to insert "The tax imposed by this subsection shall not apply to the retail stocks of fermented malt liquors held by a person on premises as to which such person has incurred occupational tax as a retail dealer in liquors or a retail dealer in malt liquors for the period beginning on July 1, 1940, and as to which no other occupational tax with respect to dealing in distilled spirits, wines, or malt liquors, has been incurred by such person for a period beginning on such date", so as to read:

"SEC. 3191. Floor-stocks tax on fermented malt liquors.

"(a) Floor-stocks tax: Upon all fermented malt liquors upon which the internal-revenue tax imposed by law has been paid, and which on July 1, 1940, are held by any person and intended for sale there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a floor-stocks tax at a rate equal to the increase in rate of tax made applicable to such articles by section 3190. The tax imposed by this subsection shall not apply to the retail stocks of fermented malt liquors held by a person on premises as to which such person has incurred occupational tax as a retail dealer in liquors or a retail dealer in malt liquors for the period beginning on July 1, 1940, and as to which no other occupational tax with respect to dealing in distilled spirits, wines, or malt liquors, has been incurred by such person for a period beginning on such date.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 30, line 12, before the word "for", to strike out "super tax" and insert "defense tax", so as to read:

SEC. 215. Playing cards.

Section 1807 of the Internal Revenue Code is amended by inserting "(a) General Rule.—" before the first paragraph and inserting at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) Defense tax for 5 years: In lieu of the rate of tax specified in subsection (a), the rate of tax for the period after June 30, 1940, and before July 1, 1945, shall be 11 cents."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 32, after line 8, to insert the following:

TITLE IV

SEC. 401. All power and authority of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury under the Silver Purchase Act of 1934 with respect to the acquisition of foreign silver shall cease and terminate on the date of enactment of this act; and all proclamations, orders, rules, regulations, and other action promulgated, made, issued, or taken by the President or the Secretary of the Treasury with respect to foreign silver pursuant to any power or authority so terminated shall cease to be effective on and after such date: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to limit the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire and make payment for foreign silver purchased or contracted for prior to the date of enactment of this act.

SEC. 402. Section 1805 of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to the tax on transfers of any interest in silver bullion) is hereby repealed.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, at this point I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Davis	Lee	Russell
Andrews	Donahey	Lodge	Schwartz
Ashurst	Downey	Lucas	Schwellenbach
Austin	Ellender	Lundeen	Sheppard

Clark, Idaho	Hughes	Pittman	Wagner
Clark, Mo.	Johnson, Colo.	Radcliffe	Walsh
Connally	King	Reed	White
Danaher	La Follette	Reynolds	Wiley

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may we not have order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not necessary for the Chair to remind Senators that they are considering quite an important bill. The pending amendment is an important one, or the Senator from Mississippi would not take the floor to discuss it. The Chair requests the occupants of the galleries also to refrain from any conversation.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, we have reached that part of the bill which contains the so-called Townsend amendment, which proposes to repeal the Silver Purchase Act as it relates to foreign silver. I desire to ask the Senator from Delaware, in view of the fact that there have been some developments with reference to this matter, whether we cannot come to some agreement. Of course, I voted in the committee against the incorporation of the amendment in the bill. I did so because the subject matter of the amendment has been considered on the floor of the Senate and action was taken by the Senate. As I recall, the bill, identical with the pending amendment, was passed by a margin of several votes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The vote was 46 to 35.

Mr. HARRISON. The bill was sent to the House, and I did not think it was proper to encumber the pending tax bill with this amendment, the subject matter of which the Senate had already considered for some 10 days.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Permit me to conclude my statement. I find that since the bill was passed some question was raised in the House as to whether the Senate had a right to take up for consideration the so-called Townsend bill, and act on it before the House had taken action. Senators will recall that the bill also repealed the internal-revenue tax on transfers of any interest in silver bullion.

Since that time there has been a new development. Any objection to the bill of the Senator from Delaware, because of any tax question raised which might involve the question of the bill originating in the House, has been withdrawn in the House. The bill has been taken from the Speaker's table and has been referred to the Ways and Means Committee. Of course, I can give the Senator from Delaware no assurance as to what action the Ways and Means Committee will take; but, in view of the fact that the technical objection as to the right of the Senate to originate the bill has been withdrawn, I am wondering whether the Senator from Delaware would not be willing to have the amendment withdrawn from the bill at this time.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi is always fair, but the bill went to the House on May 9, and has been on the Speaker's table ever since. I understood the ruling to be that it was revenue legislation, and that it was to be sent back to the Senate. Since the bill has been incorporated into the pending tax bill, they have agreed in the House, the Senator has stated, to send the bill to the Ways and Means Committee.

I do not think we should at this time, when we can have the amendment incorporated in the pending bill, agree to withdraw it. If the House acts on the bill in the meantime, that is all there will be to it.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the Senator is very persuasive, of course. After explaining to him what was done in the House yesterday about the technical objection being withdrawn and the bill having been referred to the Ways and Means Committee, how much time would the Senator desire to consume on the amendment? Can we not agree to a limitation of time for the consideration of the amendment?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly. It will take me only 10 minutes, and I shall be willing to have a vote, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent that 10 minutes be allotted to this amendment, after which time a vote shall be taken on it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I think it would be better to have a limitation of debate on each Senator. I doubt whether we would be justified in voting after listening to the Senator from Delaware, without any other Senator having an opportunity to say anything about the amendment. I suggest that we fix a limitation of 10 minutes to each Senator on the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. I make the request that not more than 10 minutes be taken by any Senator on the pending amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I should have to object to that. It is pretty early to undertake a limitation of 10 minutes, in the consideration of a bill which provides for the collection of over a billion dollars in taxes.

Mr. BARKLEY. The limitation is to be only in connection with the pending amendment.

Mr. McNARY. I understand that, but this is an important amendment, and other Senators may desire to discuss it longer than the able Senator from Delaware. I do not like the idea, and I shall object.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well. There are only two of the committee amendments left, and the Senator from Delaware may proceed then.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the silver amendment to the tax bill reads exactly the same as the text of my bill to stop the buying of foreign silver which passed the Senate on May 9. This bill, Senate bill 785, after more than a month, is still on the Speaker's table, or was yesterday. It has not been referred to any committee of the House of Representatives and that body has not acted upon it.

The reason for the delay is said to be that some members of the House considered that Senate bill 785, because it contained a provision for repeal of the tax on silver trading, infringed on the constitutional prerogatives of the House of Representatives relative to revenue-raising bills.

In the present instance the tax bill, H. R. 10039, has already passed the House of Representatives, and the amendment of the Senate Finance Committee relating to the tax on silver trading is obviously germane and in no sense violates any precedent. The reasons for removing the silver-trading tax were explained by me in the course of my speech in the Senate on April 30, 1940, which appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on pages 5249 and 5250.

The reasons why we should discontinue the purchase of foreign silver were presented and thoroughly discussed in the Senate in May, and on May 9, by a vote of 45 to 36, this body decided in favor of my measure. By adopting the pending silver amendment to the tax bill the Senate will clear the way for its enactment.

It is almost needless to point out the dire necessity facing the United States, under present world conditions, to bend every last scrap of energy to the proper defense of the Nation, and to stop every possible source of leak and wastage of our resources, however small. This is no time for easy-going squandering of millions.

The foreign-silver program was adopted in 1934 to augment this country's stock of monetary metals. How indefensible continuance of such a policy today is can be seen by only a glance at the statistics. Of gold alone this country now holds in the neighborhood of $20,000,000,000, while excess reserves of the members of the Federal Reserve System exceed $6,600,000,000.

The Treasury's Daily Statement for June 12, 1940, shows 1,280,000,000 ounces of silver held idle in the general fund, not as backing for silver certificates.

Therefore, for this country to be spending energy in buying foreign silver is a criminal waste and a dangerously foolish one.

The most recent defense of continued buying of foreign silver is that it makes employment in American factories. Is it not obvious to any school child that, because of urgent national-defense requirements, America will have hard work cut out for it for years to come? Is it not crystal clear that every worker taken away from the production of United States Army and Navy airplanes, tanks, gas masks, guns, uniforms, and supplies for the purpose of producing other goods with which to meet the demands of those who sell our Treasury tons of foreign silver we do not need, leaves a treacherous gap in the line of our national defense?

Can any Senator imagine any foreign country, however rich, importing silver it does not need under the serious conditions now facing us? Not even in peacetime did a single nation follow our example on silver. On the contrary, the whole world was quick to profit by our Silver Purchase Act and unload on us the unwanted metal.

Nor should we be so utterly foolish as to imagine that the continued purchase of foreign silver can buy goodwill abroad. That is a ridiculous assumption that only the most naive would believe. The chief beneficiaries of our silver policy need us infinitely more than we need them, and the assumption that we dare not discontinue a policy which we voluntarily adopted in 1934 because some foreign country might be sorry to see it done is an insult to the intelligence of every red-blooded American.

Mr. President, we held long hearings in the Committee on Banking and Currency, and after the hearings the bill was reported to the Senate by a vote of 14 to 4 from the committee. The Senate voted on the measure, and by a vote of 46 to 35 passed it. Now it comes to the Senate again by vote of 14 to 6 from the Finance Committee, and I sincerely hope it will be continued in the bill.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, I trust that the distinguished Senator from Delaware, as well as all other Senators here present, will not vote in support of the amendment presented by the Senator, without a full realization that the adoption of this particular amendment at this particular time will be a heavy blow to continental solidarity. If we desire to disrupt the finances of Mexico, if we desire to injure Mexico, if we desire to lend aid and comfort to the enemies of the United States in Mexico, if we desire to weaken the hands of our friends in Mexico, this is the apt and perfect way to accomplish that end.

Mr. President, I take it that one of the Achilles' heels of our defense may be developed in the neighboring territory from which we can be attacked. I myself have no fear that any aggressor from abroad will attempt directly to reach the United States and strike us from our own coast line. If any attack is made upon the United States, it must come either from Canada or from Mexico. Our relations with Canada are such that we can operate as freely and as effectively from Canada as we can from our own soil. Should we not make every effort to strengthen our fraternal bonds with our neighbor to the south to the end that harmonious cooperation in our common defense may be attained?

Let us consider the various ways that this amendment, if it were agreed to, would affect our relations with Mexico. In the first place, Mexico is very much dependent upon our commerce. Our purchase of silver from her provides her an outlet for her largest export, silver. If we cease the purchase of silver at this time, with the London market destroyed, with Mexico unable to sell any other place, we break off and disrupt that commerce, with no present means of restoring it. We destroy not only the silver industry of Mexico and disemploy hundreds of thousands of men in that industry.

We will likewise deal a heavy blow to the mining industry generally, as silver is a common byproduct in the production of other important metals and minerals.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator emphasized what would happen with respect to Mexico, which, of course, is true. But in our consideration of this question, we ought to include the Republics of Honduras, Chile, and Peru. While they do not sell us as much silver as does Mexico, they will also be seriously affected economically if the amendment in question is agreed to. Well over half of our foreign silver purchases are from the Latin American countries, largely from these I have mentioned. The Senate should realize that this is the most unfortunate time possible to take action detrimental to these particular countries whose friendship means so much in the present crisis.

Mr. DOWNEY. I thank the distinguished Senator from New York for his contribution; and, of course, what I am now saying as to the effect of the pending amendment upon our relationship with Mexico applies likewise, though in a lesser degree, to countries in South America, Central America, and Canada.

Mr. President, to understand exactly how unfortunate would be the effect of the proposed amendment, let us consider the conditions existing south of the Rio Grande. We are fortunate at the present time that the present Government of the United States has built up friendly relations with the Government of Mexico. We should be happy that President Cardenas is not only friendly to our Government, but sees eye to eye with our people in relation to events now occurring in Europe.

I ask the Senator from Delaware to consider how unfortunate it would be if there were now a government in Mexico unfriendly to us, that would allow the landing of troops there and the building of military bases for aggression against us. We should be upon our knees tonight thanking Heaven that the Government of Mexico is friendly to us. And the people of Mexico should be grateful for our increasingly friendly and fair attitude toward them.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I see no reason for Mexico being unfriendly to us by reason of our discontinuing the purchase of foreign silver from all countries alike, and paying for it 35 cents an ounce, when the chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, the Advisory Counsel to the Federal Reserve Board, and all the newspapers in the United States I have had the opportunity to read declare that we are using our good money to purchase from those foreign countries something for which we have no use. If the Senator wants to continue to give away good American money for foreigners' stuff that we have no use for, I want him to take the responsibility for it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Congress only yesterday passed a joint resolution further implementing the solidarity of the Western Hemisphere by serving notice on the world that we would not recognize or acquiesce in any transfer of ownership or propriety over any American territory to any other non-American government.

A few days ago we passed a bill through the Senate permitting the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to authorize all the western republics to use our facilities for the preparation and manufacture and the purchase of implements of defense.

Now, suppose it should transpire that, because of some unfortunate internal economic condition in any of the western republics—the Senator has mentioned Mexico, but it will apply in varying degrees to four or five other republics of the Western Hemisphere—suppose it should turn out that, in order to defend herself either against internal destruction or against foreign attack, one of these western republics should find it necessary to make application to the United States to permit her to obtain the supplies necessary for her defense in this country, and she had nothing with which to pay for it except silver, what would be our attitude, in view of what we have done to encourage her, if we denied her the opportunity to pay for it with the only commodity she had in exchange?

Mr. DOWNEY. I thank the Senator from Kentucky for that able contribution, which is no surprise coming from him, as his contributions always are of the highest order.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then, the Senator would go far enough to use our good American dollars and the labor of our country to purchase from foreigners something for which we have no use?

Mr. BARKLEY. O, Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware knows that we are not paying a dollar in money, in good American dollars or any other kind of dollars, out of the Treasury of the United States in order to get this silver.

Mr. TOWNSEND. How are we getting it?

Mr. BARKLEY. The silver is coming in here in exchange for American goods. That is how it comes here, and the Senator knows that to be so.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If we do not have to pay for it, it is the strangest transaction I know about.

Mr. BARKLEY. Silver comes in in exchange for American goods, and it finally finds its way into the American Treasury, and a new silver certificate is exchanged for every dollar of it. Not a dollar raised by taxes goes into the purchase of silver, and the Senator knows that as well as I do; yet he always talks about using good American money, and intimates that we are taking it out of the Treasury after it has been raised by taxation, in order to buy this silver.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It finally boils down to this: That we pay our good American money for something from a foreign country for which we have no use, and that Uncle Sam pays the bill.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, I think that mathematically the Senator from Delaware and other Senators who are supporting him must totally fail to comprehend the very trifling amount our Government spends on silver as compared with gold. In the first place, our Government pays 100 times as much per ounce for gold as it pays for silver—$35 an ounce for gold and 35 cents an ounce for silver. Experts tell us that the price of silver is very near its price for commercial purposes, while gold, when it becomes worth nothing as a monetary standard, will not be worth very much more than silver. In other words, we are paying $35 an ounce for gold, and when that market breaks gold will not be worth very much more than silver for commercial purposes. At 35 cents an ounce silver is very close to its value for commercial purposes, for we can always find a market for silver at $3 or $4 a pound for commercial purposes.

I realize that there are some great corporations in this Nation which would rather buy silver at 18 or 20 cents an ounce than at 35 cents an ounce. I do not blame such companies. Their attitude is reasonable. I am not attacking any Senator who represents that viewpoint. Of course, if industries want to make more money, they would rather buy in a free market than in a governmental market which holds the price of silver at 25 or 30 percent above its commercial value. But, Mr. President, speaking from some study of and experience with Mexican conditions, it seems to me that rather than discontinue the purchase of silver from Mexico, so that some of our businesses may buy silver a few cents an ounce cheaper, it would be better for us to give to them every pound of silver in the Treasury of the United States, because it might prove cheaper in the long run.

The distinguished Senator from Delaware has said that we have the right to take the proposed action. Of course, if we want to imperil continental solidarity, we have the right to do it. There is no doubt of that. But I wish to tell the Senator from Delaware how the people of Mexico may look at it, though Senators who read history with their prejudices and not with their reason may have difficulty comprehending my statement. Many Mexican citizens know that our businessmen have been guilty of many acts of bribery and oppression. Many of them know that revolutions have been fomented in the American Embassy, and that arms and men have been distributed in revolutionary outbreaks from the American Embassy in Mexico. Let me be clearly understood. I am referring to past conditions that will never be repeated, I hope. But let us recall, Mr. President, that oppressive conduct is not forgotten in a day and that many citizens of Mexico do not wholly agree with the attitude of their Government toward the people of the United States. So if we want to make it hard for the Government of Mexico to carry all the citizens of Mexico into friendly relations with us, we should approve this amendment. Otherwise, not.

Oh, yes, Mr. President, this amendment is a good way to fracture continental solidarity.

Why is it a good way? Because within 30 days it will devastate Mexican finances. It may create a panic. It will surely throw out of employment multitudes of Mexican workers. It is all right for us in the Senate to say that we have the right to do that. Of course we have, and if we wish to destroy Mexican commerce and Mexican friendship for us, we should do that very thing.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. Does it not seem to the Senator a paradox that at the very time when the President and other agencies of the Government are discussing a plan for the interchange of goods between American countries for our mutual interest and protection, we should consider passing a law which will deprive Mexico—taking Mexico for illustration—of the opportunity of exporting a commodity which represents 20 percent of all its exports by value? Would not such a law be absolutely at variance with our national policy and destructive of our national-defense program in this hemisphere?

Mr. DOWNEY. Yes. To answer the distinguished Senator from New York, it seems to me to be a most extraordinary thing. The whole Nation is alarmed and disturbed about our national defense. I think every Senator should place the defense of his people and his Nation first.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I am not particularly familiar with Mexican politics, but the Senator's statements regarding the present government's attitude seem to me contrary to the impression I had received. After all, the Cardenas government has freely confiscated American property and refused to pay for it in any way. It has sponsored and invited communistic organizations to meet in Mexico. My understanding is that the man who is now contesting the Cardenas government is far more friendly to the United States than is the Cardenas party itself. Will the Senator advise me as to the conditions of Mexican politics? My understanding is contrary to what he has been saying about the friendly attitude of the Cardenas government.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, I consider it improper for me to make any comment in the Senate about the attitude of presidential candidates in Mexico toward the American people or the American Government, and I will not do that. However, I will say that I have personally known and talked with some of the leaders of the present Mexican Government, and I can assure the distinguished Senator from Ohio that they are most favorably inclined toward the people of the United States. Whoever is elected President, I hope that that attitude may continue. However, let me say, Mr. President, that I think that Senators who support this measure fail to apprehend the waves of chaos and revolutionary disturbance which will sweep this continent and the world in the next 2 or 3 years.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I shall be glad to yield in a moment.

I think all our power and efforts should be conserved and projected toward stabilizing and making Mexico more prosperous. Although we have the right to do this particular act, the cold fact is that it will help destroy Mexican finances, Mexican commerce, and Mexican employment. It will help to destroy our friendship with Mexico.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. My recollection is that when this matter was debated previously it was stated by those who know about silver that, as a matter of fact, silver is intrinsically worth 35 cents an ounce, or substantially that amount, and that there would be no substantial reduction in price, or, if so, only a few cents. I do not quite see, therefore, why our discontinuance of the purchase of silver would have any such revolutionary effect on Mexican finances, and why the silver which Mexico produces would not be worth substantially as much as before, without forcing us into the position of issuing silver certificates and inflating our currency for the purpose of carrying out the purchase.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, do I need to call to the attention of the distinguished Senator from Ohio the probability that within the next 24 or 48 hours England will be under siege? Does the Senator realize that from now on Mexico cannot sell her silver in the London market, or to the other nations which are at war? With present world conditions Mexico cannot hope to find any market whatsoever for her silver, even though the experts may tell us that intrinsically silver is worth from 20 to 25 cents an ounce and I think ultimately it may be worth substantially more than that.

Mr. BARKLEY and Mr. TAFT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield first to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, while it is true that 35 cents an ounce has been the world price, the world price is fixed because of the number of purchasers of silver and the demand for silver. What has been coming into the United States has not been bringing on the market, and in exchange for our goods, more than the world price; but it was stated before the committee and on the floor of the Senate that if the United States were to withdraw the opportunity for silver to come into the United States, and thereby remove from the world market one of the large consumers of silver, the price would in all probability drop to 20 cents an ounce. That, of course, is speculative. No one can tell what effect the withdrawal of the United States from the silver market would have; but, in view of what the Senator says as to the London market and the inability of England or France, and perhaps all of Europe, longer to participate in the silver market, if we should withdraw it is very probable that the price would drop much below 20 cents an ounce.

Mr. DOWNEY. I thank the Senator for his contribution. I might go further and say that in view of the present disturbed world conditions Mexico would find difficulty in finding any market whatsoever in the whole civilized world today.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to one further fact, and then I shall conclude.

Last year we imported into the United States three and a half billion dollars of gold; we imported about $70,000,000 of silver. In other words, the total amount of silver imported was about 2 percent of the total amount of gold. Right now every week we are taking in more gold at $35 an ounce than we will take in in a whole year in silver.

The Senator from Delaware is to be admired and congratulated for his attempt to set right the unfortunate monetary condition of the United States; I do congratulate him, and I hope that when he takes up the problem of gold in a big way he will work it out; but to try to save on Mexican silver five or ten or fifteen million dollars a year with the possible penalty of destroying the friendship and cooperation between the two nations, I cannot believe is justified.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is not five or ten or fifteen million dollars. The Government is paying $130,000,000 a year for foreign silver; and that is much below the amount it was paying out 2 years ago, when it was as high as $250,000,000.

Mr. DOWNEY. I am sure the Senator is in error in his statement on the amount spent last year on foreign silver. The sum was approximately $70,000,000; but, in any event, my remarks, Mr. President, referred particularly to Mexico. We are buying annually about 100,000,000 ounces of silver from Mexico, and at 35 cents an ounce that costs about $35,000,000. But that $35,000,000 worth of silver is worth at least twenty or twenty-five million dollars for commercial purposes. Consequently, all we are losing on the silver we are buying from Mexico is from five to ten million dollars a year. So far as I am concerned, I would rather see this Nation spend five or ten billion dollars than to lose the friendship or to risk the loss of the friendship and cooperation of Mexico.

For these reasons I am strongly opposed to this amendment. I hope it will be defeated.

OPPOSITION TO ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I rise to say that I am firmly convinced that the Congress should not adjourn at this critical time, and if my mail is any indication at all, the people throughout the Nation want Congress to remain in session during the emergency. They say we would be deserting our post in time of crisis if we should quit now. I am getting every day thousands of telegrams and letters from Kansas and from all parts of the country protesting against Congress adjourning at the present time. These protests come from farm groups, veterans' organizations, businessmen, churches, educational associations, and all classes of citizens. It is my best judgment at this time that Congress should not adjourn prior to the Republican national convention. I very much doubt if Congress should do more than recess for each convention. At any rate, decision as to adjournment or recess before the Democratic convention should wait until we see what happens in the early days of next month.

There can be no question the country wants Congress to stay on the job. They want the Congress to keep the United States out of war. After all, we are hired by the year, and if it seems events may occur which might require congressional action, the Congress should respect the wishes of the people and stay here to deal with such eventualities and also do everything we can to keep us out of Europe's war.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a few of the letters and telegrams received by me in the past few days, which indicate what is in the minds of our constituents at this moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letters and telegrams are as follows:

GREELEY, KANS., June 14, 1940.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: Pottawatomie Grange, No. 1502, discussing the trend of world affairs and the relation of the United States to world affairs, have voted.

Feeling the counsel of the Congress is of paramount value to our statesman, we respectfully request you use your influence to remain in session in the National Capital that you may render all aid and counsel possible to our President.

Sincerely,

MRS. THERESA ROMMELFANGER,
Secretary, Pottawatomie Grange, No. 1502.

BERRYTON GRANGE FAIR,
Berryton, Kans., June 13, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Berryton Grange, No. 1430, of Berryton, Kans., at its regular meeting of June 12, went on record as desiring Congress to remain in session during the present crisis and to notify our Senators and Congressman of that desire.

Very truly yours,

BERRYTON GRANGE, No. 1430.

Whereas the strife and warfare in Europe now threatening to engulf the entire Eastern Hemisphere leads to unsettled conditions, uneasiness, unrest, uncertainty in the Western Hemisphere, and more particularly the United States of America; and

Whereas it now appears that the Government of the United States of America must proceed with all dispatch to prepare for national defense, and at the same time proceed with caution and utmost neutrality, in order that this country may not become involved in this great calamity: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be requested to remain in session at the Capitol in Washington, D. C., until the crisis is passed; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States; JOHN N. GARNER, Vice President and President of the United States Senate; WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States; and to each of the Members of the Kansas delegation in the Senate and in the House of Representatives.

C. V. HAGGMAN, M. D.,
Scandia, Kans., June 12, 1940.

The Honorable ARTHUR CAPPER,
The Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Due to the tragic and grave situation in Europe and to our position in world affairs we believe it is necessary for Congress to remain in session.

We also believe in the United States giving all possible aid to the Allies.

Yours truly,

C. V. Haggman, M. D.; Mrs. C. V. Haggman; Mrs. Mary Creager; Blanche M. Haggman, R. N.; E. Porter Ahrens, D. D. S.; E. C. Wires, druggist; E. T. Olsen, mayor; Mrs. Cora Ahrens, acting postmaster; Sharmore Roberts, assistant postmaster.

JENNINGS POST, NO. 351, THE AMERICAN LEGION,
Jennings, Kans., June 11, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: By command of our post, in regular meeting assembled, we are writing to inform you it is our considered opinion it would be to the best interest of our country for the Congress of the United States to remain in session until such time as the present "war emergency" shall have abated, and we ask that you use your best efforts to that end.

Yours very truly,

MELVIN STEPHENS,
Post Judge Advocate.
H. M. HICKERT,
Commander.
JESSE M. HUFF,
Vice Commander.
HENRY HEILMAN,
Adjutant.
A. N. HICKERT,

JOHN L. WELTER.

OVERLAND PARK, KANS., June 13, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Regardless of the fact that the political conventions will be held shortly, I believe that Congress should stay in session.

We all know that a grave crisis is facing this country, and I believe that every man should be at his post. This is no time for the law-making body of our Government to recess as in the coming months there will be many laws to pass, repeal, and amend, and in the paraphrased words of Lord Nelson, "Today, America expects every American to do his duty."

The present situation requires the constant attention of Congress now.

Respectfully yours,

D. K. DICKINSON,
Commander, Dwight Cowles Post, No. 370.

MEDICINE LODGE, KANS., June 13, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

The Barber County Post, No. 69, American Legion, Medicine Lodge, Kans., urges you that regardless of impending political conventions the Congress remain in session during the present world unrest and/or until the national preparedness program is fully completed.

W. J. COPPINGER, Adjutant.

OSAWATOMIE, KANS., June 13, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D.C.:

Members of our post want the Senate to remain in session during the emergency notwithstanding the political conventions.

HINKLE POST, 204, AMERICAN LEGION.

SYRACUSE, KANS., June 13, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER.

DEAR SIR: Legion Post No. 27 feels our Congress should stay in session for the present. Personally and from opinions formed by talking to many others there is too much power in the hands of a few at the head of our Government. We want no more wars on foreign soil. Hope this gets to you in time. I could get many signers for this by others than the Legion.

Yours truly,

MERLE D. SELLERS,
Post Commander.

SYRACUSE, KANS.

We, the undersigned officers and members of the H. F. B. H. Post, No. 27, of the American Legion, Kansas, do hereby request you use all your influence possible to demand that Congress stay in session "during the emergency."

Merle D. Sellers, commander; Lovell Cumming, adjutant; R. B. Owings, Harry Herndon, J. R. Bane, G. F. Shirley, James R. Brogan, W. R. Schroll, N. W. Oakes, William C. Zimmerman, E. W. McNeal, George H. Fuller, J. B. Owings.

FLEMING-JACKSON-SEEVER POST, No. 6,
Atchison, Kans., June 13, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I wish to urge upon you the necessity that Congress stay in session during this emergency, notwithstanding the political conventions. The present situation requires the constant attention of Congress now.

Sincerely yours,

O. P. MAY.

SMITH CENTER, KANS.,
June 13, 1940.

Senator CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I, with 72 members of the U. S. Center Post of the American Legion, together with the mandate of the 1939 National Legion Convention, notwithstanding the party conventions, urge that Congress remain in session during the emergency of strained international relations.

We also question the advisability of high Government officials making speeches to the world stating our feelings on international affairs and questions. Actions are more effective than words and are not so effective as evidence.

Please permit me to again remind you of H. R. Nos. 8930 and 9000.

Sincerely,

MACK WERTZ, Post Commander.

GEORGE W. HOOD POST, No. 91,
THE AMERICAN LEGION,
Washington, Kans., June 12, 1940.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The members of George W. Hood Post, No. 91, the American Legion, urge you to use all your power and efforts to keep the United States Congress in continuous session during the present emergency.

Very truly yours,

FRANK G. KIRK, Commander.

MIAMI POST, No. 156,
THE AMERICAN LEGION,
Paola, Kans., June 13, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: The 126 members of Miami Post, No. 156, American Legion, request that you use your influence in having Congress remain in session during the emergency.

We feel that this is a grave time and that the present situation requires a constant attention of Congress now.

Notwithstanding the coming political conventions, we think Congress should remain in session.

Thanking you for past favors, I am

Yours truly,

OTTO GERKE, Commander.

LUKE STEED POST, No. 159,
THE AMERICAN LEGION,
Fort Riley, Kans., June 12, 1940.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
House of Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The members of this post urge that you do everything possible in supporting a resolution that Congress stay in session during this emergency.

Thanking you for what you have done in the past in supporting resolutions adopted by the American Legion, I beg to remain,

Very truly yours,

RAYMOND CURTIS,
Commander, Luke Steed Post.

COLUMBUS, KANS., June 14, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senator.

We request Congress remain in session during period of emergency.

THE AMERICAN LEGION.

OUR TRIOS POST, No. 92,
AMERICAN LEGION,
Meade, Kans., June 12, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: We wish to acquaint you and all our representation in Congress that it is the unanimous belief of all Legionnaires in this southwestern part of Kansas that Congress stay in session during the emergency now confronting the United States and the entire world.

A possible recess can be taken if the conventions interfere but this is not recommended as a wise course.

We urge you to remain at your posts of duty in Washington.

Respectfully submitted.

W. H. SOURBIER,
Legion Commander.

THE FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH OF LAWRENCE, KANS.,
June 12, 1940.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: The clipping I enclose is from the morning Kansas City Times, and expresses my sentiments in regard to keeping Congress in session during this grave crisis through which we are passing.

Congress should be in session ready to act with the President if the need arises, but above all it should be on guard lest we get into this overseas war.

I trust you will do all in your power to keep the Congress in Washington as long as seems necessary.

With sincere hopes for the highest welfare of country, I am,

Very respectfully yours,

GEORGE SHAWNEE.

THE FIRST METHODIST CHURCH AND
THE WESLEY FOUNDATION AT THE UNIVERSITY OF KANSAS,
Lawrence, Kans, June 15, 1940.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: I wish once more to commend your firm stands for peace and for maintaining democratic procedures. Democracy can never be defended (?) except by practicing democracy. A war to defend democracy would immediately result in the repudiation of democracy through creation of a virtual dictatorship and the institution of M-day regimentation.

Be assured that large numbers of youth, with whom it is my privilege to work, are ready to give unstintedly for our country's well-being through peaceful service; but they, as I, are convinced that war can never achieve any enduring good for our country and that democracy cannot be defended except by courageous democratic practice and by national attitudes and works of constructive, cooperative solution of the ills of humanity.

Specifically, I earnestly urge your continued courageous leadership for:

1. Insistence that the United States remain at peace—in fact as well as in word.
2. Resistance to all attempts to delegate to the administration power to call out militia or to declare an emergency and initiate M day.
3. Resistance to all attempts to institute a draft or compulsory military training.
4. Urging Congress to remain in session as long as a national emergency exists. That could be done for months at far less cost than one battleship—or one international mistake.

Appreciating your constructive leadership, I remain,

Sincerely,

REV. EDWIN F. PRICE.

PROTECTION, KANS., June 11, 1940.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR HONORABLE SENATOR: May God bless you for your attitude on the war question. Europe's troubles are age-old, having been going before we as a nation were born. We miserably failed in any permanent settlement of their affairs about a quarter of a century ago, and another effort could even be worse.

Nationally, preparation for defense has its place, and my prayers ascend daily for our Congress, our President. Should compulsory military training come as a part of the defense program, may God bless our National Legislature that due consideration may be given to those of us who, for scriptural reasons and conscience's sake, cannot take up training for a soldier's life.

With gratefulness to our Government for past considerations, and with trust in God for the future, I close, remaining,

Sincerely yours,

Bishop D. D. MILLER.

FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH,
Manhattan, Kans., June 12, 1940.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: May we continue to count on you to make every effort to keep America out of the present world war?

It seems to many of us, practically all with whom I have talked, that Congress should remain in session during the present crisis.

It would cast a favorable light upon all if they could forget for the time their politics and remember that they are Americans.

I am, respectfully yours,

FREDERIC S. LA RUE.

SOLOMON PRESBYTERIAL SOCIETY, KANSAS SYNODICAL,
June 12, 1940.

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: We listen to and enjoy your Sunday evening broadcasts so much. We believe Congress should remain in session during this real emergency, until definite plans are made and being carried out for our national defense, and that Congress should decide upon our attitude toward other nations, not any one man.

Our first defense is to rid the country of antagonists within—deport all who are against the United States form of government.

At our Dickinson County Women's Republican Club meeting a few months ago we passed unanimously a resolution about which our president, Miss Helen Seelye, wrote you, Senator REED, and Representative REES. I believe this is a fine time to put through a bill and pass an amendment to the Constitution to this effect:

1. That representation be according to number of United States citizens.
2. That all members of executive, legislative, and judiciary be required, the same as President, to be native-born citizens of our Republic of United States of America.

This would be an opportunity to also limit term of office of President to one 6- or two 4-year terms.

Our club is now putting on a membership drive—dues 25 cents—aimed at 800 members out of 3,000 registered Republican women in county.

We women worry so much over conditions in this country. We are free to say what we please, but there seems little that we can do about it.

We hope to save our American Christian civilization, and that you will help us to stay out of this war, which is not ours.

Sincerely,

LILLIAN C. GRAFF.

P. S.—Daily I pray God to be merciful to us, to spare us the horrors of warfare, and that our young people may have faith and courage to face the aftermath which we shall have to share.

God bless you for your stand against war.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In view of the serious international and national situation, we feel that it is advisable for Congress to remain in session until the immediate crisis is passed.

Very truly yours,

WHITING, KANS., June 4, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I am not much when it comes to writing letters, but your leaflet was received and has been carefully read. And I agree with every word 100 percent. You mentioned Senator CLARK. I also have been watching him and have admired the stand he has taken. I used to see quite a bit of his father, "Champ" Clark, when I lived in Iowa. The last time I saw him was when he and ex-Congressman Grosvenor, of Ohio, came to Tama, Iowa, to have a debate ("horse and buggy" days). Then I remember paying CLARK'S father-in-law $350 for an imported Guernsey heifer and ship to the farm here in Kansas.

I think Congress should stay in Washington this summer as long as the European situation is as it is.

Glad immigration was taken out of and away from labor.

I called on Senator TAFT at Topeka, and liked him very much, although I was a Bull Mooser, etc., in past days.

Met Wendell Willkie at Kansas City; very much taken with him. Saw young Theo. R. at Topeka, like him; but just cannot fall for Dewey.

Gannet sure has made good the last few days, although I haven't the pleasure of knowing him.

Someone (Democrat) called on F. D. R. F. D. R. asked him who he would vote for in place of himself. He said anybody.

We had plenty thunder last night, but no rain, which is needed.

There has never been a time in history of the United States when farmer could pay 6-percent interest and get away with it. So hope Wallace's 3 percent goes through, but am not sure about it from an economic standpoint. Have not gone into it that far, but if it is O. K. from that standpoint, it is a step in the right way.

Yours faithfully,

CHAS. F. M. STONE.

CLAY CENTER, KANS., June 8, 1940.

To the Honorable Senator BRIDGES,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: After having heard your radio address as of June 7, 1940, I feel it necessary that I write to you complimenting you on your talk.

I am one of those who, on April 8, 1917, offered my services to my country and spent the greater part of 2 years overseas. For this service I claim the right to speak freely to you at this time.

For Congress to adjourn at this time is only comparable to the absconding of King Leopold, of Belgium—deserting his subjects when they needed him most. I think that Congress should remain in session and in some way try to alleviate the sufferings of the American people due to their treasonable acts of delegating power to the President of the United States not granted him under the Constitution. Perhaps I am a little bitter, but I do believe that granting the President powers to which he is not entitled on 67 different occasions to build him up whereby he can make laws by an Executive order, taking away from me my rights as an American citizen under the Constitution, is nothing less than treason. I think I feel the same as a great many American citizens feel at this time concerning the situation in Washington. I think the first duty of Congress is to stay in session until this emergency is over and take back for the people their rights that have been taken away from them.

I would like to refer you to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 83, and No. 34, to an article by Mr. HOFFMAN, of Michigan, found on page 2677. It covers several pages, but I am quite sure that your time would be well spent in reading it.

Hoping that I have not been too blunt in my statements, I am,

Yours very truly,

D. O. JACKSON, M. D.

GARDNER, KANS.

DEAR SENATOR: I am going to ask that Congress stay on guard as long as the situation demands it. No more powers to the President are desirable. And no blank checks. He doesn't seem to know what he wants or why. We, of course, do not want any war.

Sincerely,

O. P. JOHNSON.

OMAHA, NEBR.

DEAR MR. CAPPER: For God's sake stay in Washington and don't lose your head, or we will be throwing Government contracts around in useless rearmament and this set-up will have us across the pond as they have planned for years. It is up to you. The majority I talk to feel the same way.

Yours,

R. T. JOHNSTON.

TOPEKA, KANS., June 6, 1940.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: It is through you I hope to deliver this message to Congress.

I, an American citizen, urge Congress to say in session during the critical months to come. Keep the power of Congress to steer us through this situation. Keep the defense program out of control of politicians or one man, and allow industrialists and business managers to plan to the advantage of this good old United States.

Sincerely,

Mrs. MAYSEL DELANEY.

GARNETT, KANS., June 5, 1940.

DEAR SENATOR: I think Congress ought to stay in session indefinitely to look after this Nation's interests in this time of war abroad, so as to safeguard those interests and, if possible, to stay out of the wars of Europe and Asia. Of course, we ought to prepare for defense as rapidly as it can be done with efficiency. I have never felt easy about our foreign policy in the hands of the present administration, and if Congress stays in session it might prove a safeguard against any wild move.

With sincere regards, I am,

Rev. M. D. BRYANT,
Christian Minister in Your Old Home Town.

LEAVENWORTH, KANS., June 8, 1940.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: See by this morning's paper the following: "Await the Draft Step." What does this mean? The volunteers are not coming in fast enough. Has the President's four sons volunteered? If not, why not?

Things don't look good to me, and every American citizen should wake up. Seems they have been unconcerned as to what the President is doing, and his rubber-stamp Congress.

Hope you will vote against this compulsory service, or our democracy is gone before we start to fight for it. We don't want a dictator in the United States, and it seems we are headed there at a high rate of speed. By all means, Senator CAPPER, vote to have Congress remain in session during this critical period. I know you will never vote to send the boys over to fight a war that is not our war, but if this compulsory service goes into effect we can look forward to nothing but war.

If the United States would keep out, I think the war would end in a short time, but the President wants us to get into this war, and he has been given entirely too much power. Where is our freedom if we have to listen to one man, a great country like this?

Respectfully,

ANNA HOY.

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: We earnestly urge that you use all your influence to prevent the early adjournment of Congress. If ever the collective wisdom of our Representatives in Washington was needed, it is now.

We favor giving all possible help to the Allies short of sending American soldiers to Europe.

MY DEAR SENATOR: On behalf of all the members of our firm, I have been asked to write you to use your influence to keep Congress in session, and not to adjourn as long as there is danger of entanglement in Europe.

Also, we believe the militia should only be subject to call by Congress, and not by the President alone.

We believe in defense, but in no circumstances to send our soldiers to any foreign soil to settle someone else's troubles. We ask that you use your good office to that effect.

Thanking you for your earnest consideration in the above matter, I am,

Yours very truly,

WICHITA, KANS.

Senator CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: As a citizen of the United States whom you are representing, I plead with you to use all your influence to (1) keep the United States out of the war; (2) to oppose the proposed measure for compulsory military training.

This measure would be unconstitutional. Our Constitution stipulates religious freedom. This measure would take religious freedom away from such groups as Methodists, Mennonites, and Friends.

Let's not lose the very thing we are so anxious to preserve. (3) To use your influence in support that Congress remain in session rather than giving the President dictatorial power of the Army and Navy.

The United States must stay out of the war.

Sincerely,

Mrs. MAX SAVAGE.

OLMITZ, KANS., June 11, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I am writing you at this time to encourage you to live up to the splendid promise you have repeatedly made, that you will not vote to send our boys across to fight Europe's battle again. We have not forgotten the "kept us out of war." We wish to impress that Congress should not adjourn but stay on the job and protect us from foreign propaganda and hired newspapers and paid columnists to spread their propaganda to get us in war and sacrifice our boys for the benefit of Europe's age-old war.

They fooled us once, and it looks like they are working good and making headway now to do it again.

We thank you, Dear Senator, for the stand you are taking. Stay with it and, above all, stay in Washington and watch out for the interest of our State and country.

Very truly yours,

J. G. SCHREIBER.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
House of Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Our country today is in grave danger. It is going to take cool, clear thinking and effort to guide us through.

Congress should stay in session to see that our country is properly prepared and made ready for all emergencies. We must not permit ourselves to be caught in the position in which England and France found themselves.

Unfortunately, our President does not possess the ability to supply the leadership needed. Therefore it becomes imperative that our Congress be constantly on the alert to guide us safely through.

You (the Congress) are our safeguard at this time. We look forward to your continued best effort to see us safely through this storm.

Sincerely yours,

Dr. C. A. BROOKS.

DEAR SIR: We are asking you to use your influence to keep Congress in Washington during the international crisis, also to use every means possible to keep the United States out of war.

DEAR SIR: Stay on the job.

Hitler and his Huns should be forced east of the Rhine where we of the A. E. F. left them in 1919, but in this country President Roosevelt needs watching himself, and I think Congress should remain in session and do the job.

Respectfully yours,

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,

MY DEAR MR. CAPPER: I am writing you this brief note to indicate how many of us feel regarding the early adjournment of Congress. For reasons which I am sure you will readily understand, thousands of your constituents feel that it would be unsafe to adjourn Congress while the international situation remains so critical. I hope you will do everything in your power to keep Congress in session indefinitely, even though I am sure this will be a hardship on many of the Members.

Do not bother to answer this. I just wanted you to know how I felt about it.

DEAR SIR: In contacting our people in this locality we find that a large majority are of the opinion that the Congress should remain in session, at least until a degree of stabilization has been worked out.

The Honorable Senator ARTHUR CAPPER: We have no knowledge of the pressure that is being exerted on you and your colleagues to drag our dear country into the war. While we know that you are exerting all your influence to keep the United States out of the European conflagration, we still wish to give you our moral support in the fight you are making for us. I am glad for the statement in the papers made by Senator WHEELER, of Montana: "I'm not going to support any candidate for President who's going to try to get us into the war." Although we have no sympathy for a country that wants to rule by force, still to try and conquer them is to stoop to their methods when this country has its hands full with her own problems. Let us solve our internal difficulties and remain a strong democracy, and no Hitler can harm us with his force from without.

Very truly yours,

Dr. and Mrs. G. R. GOEDDERT.

P. S.—We think it would be safer to keep Congress in session during the summer.

UNIVERSITY OF WICHITA,

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senator from Kansas,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: Just a note to let you know how the six voting members of our family stand on the questions before us at this critical time.

We ask you not to weaken in your fight for United States neutrality. Your original strict neutrality stand has had our continuous endorsement. Don't waver now.

Why not add your voice to that of courageous Senator WHEELER and help put our dictator-inclined President in his proper place? One individual cannot and does not speak for all the people, but F. D. R. would usurp that privilege and at the same time claim to be the champion of democracy. Let's demand true democratic processes. We look to you to help keep a tight checkrein on our emotional Chief lest he go completely haywire.

By all means stay in Washington. Congress must remain on the job now by all means and represent the sober-minded element of the country. Of course, we're counting on you to fight to retain the Johnson Act and other such orderly thought-out acts which should not be overthrown in moments of hysteria which our excitable and unstable Chief Executive seems to have stirred up.

Sincerely yours,

G. W. MELCHER.

KANORADO, KANS., June 12, 1940.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,

MY DEAR SENATOR: I feel that Congress should be in session during an emergency, and I feel that a greater emergency exists at the present time than has existed for some time.

I also think that when emergencies exist, like at the present time, decisions which are vital to all of the people, as well as to the Nation itself, should not be left for one man to decide.

Therefore I ask that if you can conscientiously do so to vote against the adjournment of Congress at the present time. I am sure that if you can vote to keep Congress in session until this emergency has passed your action will be appreciated by many more than I.

I certainly hope that the United States can honorably keep out of war. I believe that this is the wish of the majority of the people.

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: I sincerely hope that you will use every resource at your command to prevent the adjournment of Congress during these summer months while it appears so necessary that our country remain in the hands of its citizens.

We are face to face with a very serious emergency and undoubtedly there are many minds in Washington who are included in the Roosevelt circle of intimate advisers who would seize upon this opportunity to further experiment with alien ideas, and we must not allow this to happen. One man, even though his name may be Roosevelt, cannot know the personal reactions of 130,000,000 people in this country.

Senator CAPPER,

MY DEAR MR. CAPPER: Due to world conditions, as an American citizen and a voter in Kansas, I urge—

(1) That Congress remain in session indefinitely to safeguard our democracy.

(2) That only American-born citizens be allowed to work in munitions and airplane factories, Government offices, on Government or defense projects, or anywhere else where espionage or sabotage would be detrimental to our defense.

(3) That all unions be abolished, so that all American-born citizens who wish may work, so that employers may hire their own choice of help without dictation from outside interests, and so that the enormous income from union dues be retained in the pockets of the laborers and not lining pockets of high-powered executives of sometimes doubtful derivation and patriotism. Also to avoid danger of strikes.

(4) That all subversive activities be investigated.

(5) That party politics and vote-getting be sidetracked; if necessary, even eliminating all elections for this year.

Where no legislation covers the above-mentioned points, I again urge that such legislation be enacted to preserve our democracy.

I am sincerely,

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Mayflower Hotel, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: We out here in Kansas are becoming very much disturbed about the possibility of Congress adjourning and leaving the fate of America in one man's hands.

Congress for the past 3 or 4 years has stayed in session for spending large amounts of money, which seems to have done very little good. It seems to me that a very grave responsibility is that of the Senate and House of Representatives to stay in session until something more definite comes out of the conflict in Europe.

Hundreds of people are talking about this, and I am passing this information on to you for what it may be worth.

Very truly yours,

CHAS. O. BLEVANS, President.

THE PENN MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE CO.,
Topeka, Kans., June 12, 1940.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: It does not seem possible that a single Member of the House or Representatives or a single United States Senator would give a moment's consideration to the thought of an adjournment of Congress during the crisis that confronts this country.

I am confident that you and the entire Kansas delegation will oppose, with every ounce of energy you possess, an effort on the part of any person, or persons, to influence Congress to abdicate its responsbility to the people now.

Our President needs and should have the counsel of Congress in making decisions of such momentous consequences as confront this country. The people of the United States have the right to expect sane, careful consideration of every question regarding the war situation, not hasty, impulsive decisions that may have very serious consequences.

Let us lend every aid possible to the Allies, but let us at all times give first thought to our own safety and well being.

I here voice the preponderance of opinions as I hear it daily on the street and every place I go, "Congress should stay in session continuously as long as war clouds hang heavily over the world."

Sincerely yours,

J. E. SPALDING,
Associate General Agent.

DEAR SIR: After reading your article in Capper's Weekly of June 8, we want to let you know that we approve of the action you are taking in regard to the many questions arising at this time. We don't want our foreign policy to include intervention in the European war.

We also hope you will vote against compulsory training for our boys from 18 to 20. Why should they, who are just coming into manhood, have to be the first ones called?

We trust and pray we will not be drawn into this terrible conflict. We are also praying that our leaders will think of the awful cost before going in.

May we as parents remind you that we are standing by you.

PALMER, KANS., June 12, 1940.

To the Honorable Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: In view of the even more grave world situation I feel it my duty to encourage you to maintain the stand you have repeatedly expressed in word and deed, and that is to keep this beloved Nation of ours from complete intervention in the European war, and to this end I think it absolutely necessary for the Congress and Senate to stay in continuous session until the war is over; and by all means do not repeal the Johnson Act, which inevitably would lead to complete intervention in our judgment. Let us apply the Monroe Doctrine both ways—America for the Americans and Europe for the Europeans. Let us stay out of the European mess. Now we know fully well that you stand for everything that we want and need but we are sending you this message to encourage you to stand fast, and we are praying that the good Lord may bless your effort for the sake of our boys and the future welfare of our whole Nation.

Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: Legions of people like myself, who are members of families that have lived in this country for generations, and who have always tried to stand for the best ideals of American citizenship, are greatly disturbed by the emotionalism and hysteria that are sweeping us closer to war. And, Mr. Capper, we are looking to our Representatives in Congress to stay on the job in Washington to help solve our problems in this grave situation. That, we feel, is their responsibility, and we do not want them running away from it.

Years of sober consideration convinced us that we had no business in another European war. Surely the hysteria of a week should not plunge us into the conflict. We are willing and eager to help the Allies in every way possible short of war, but we do not want our American young men slaughtered across the sea. Everyone to whom I talk feels that way about the situation.

Yours very truly,

L. W. BURTCH.

Hon. Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CAPPER: Stay in session. Keep us out of a war that is definitely not our war.

Congress bears this responsibility and I am depending upon you as our representative to stop Roosevelt now.

Help keep us out of war.

Sincerely,

MARY ALICE JORDAN,
3500 York Way, Topeka, Kans.

EMPORIA, KANS., June 12, 1940.

DEAR MR. CAPPER: Will you please do all you can to have Congress remain in session as long as you feel there is an emergency.

Very truly,

MRS. W. J. COLLINS.
W. J. COLLINS.

ELLINWOOD, KANS., June 11, 1940.

DEAR SIR: In view of the troubled world conditions and the bellicose attitude of our President, we most strongly urge you to protect our American interests and our homes by using your vote and influence to keep Congress in session.

We feel that our safety lies in our Senators and Representatives who alone have the constitutional right to vote on the vital issue of war or peace for the United States.

We feel that the Allies can best be aided by our industry and the maintenance of peace in this country. We deeply resent the attitude of our President in making promises and inflammatory speeches and assuming power to pledge aid. This is, we feel, the right and duty of our two Houses.

We add our voice to others who also feel that Congress should remain in session, as this, we feel, is our only bulwark against dictatorship in this country. Our sincerest thanks to you for your voicing the opinion of the people of Kansas in the past.

We have the honor to remain,

Yours very truly,

JOHN A. WEBER.
VALERIE E. WEBER.

WHITE CITY, KANS., June 12, 1940.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.:

We are asking you to do everything in your power to keep this country out of war.

We think the defense program is all right, but we must not be allowed to get in this war under the screen of our defense.

We also think that Congress should stay in session until the danger of this war is over, if for no other reason than to hold our President down, and give him to understand that this is not a one-man Government as yet. We think Congress must stay in session to protect the people from the President's mistakes.

We heard the President's speech, and the way it sounds, he is doing his best to get us in the war, instead of keeping us out of it.

So we are asking you, our Senator, to do your best to keep us out of the European conflict.

DALE NORTH.

CANEY, KANS., June 12, 1940.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER.

DEAR SIR: I'm writing you in the interest of this terrible tragedy of war. Won't you please stay in Congress and use what influence you have to keep others to stay? For we need you all in the interest of peace. Please do all you can for us, for you're all we have to look to for our peace and to save our boys in the foreign countries. I'll always praise you and your efforts to help us.

Your friends,

The BARRIS FAMILY.

LEAVENWORTH, KANS., June 11, 1940.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: After hearing Mr. Roosevelt's speech last night, I think it more important than ever that Congress remain in session.

I cannot understand how Congress can allow one man to rule these United States. The people that are represented by Congress are expecting Congress to act for them.

Thanking you, I am,

Respectfully yours,

ANNA HOY.

INDEPENDENCE, KANS., June 13, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: In view of the vast expenditures authorized by Congress for national defense and other purposes, the prospective passage of a brand new tax bill increasing materially the taxes, the increasing the national debt limit $4,000,000,000, and the general situation in Europe, it would seem that it is the imperative duty of Congress to remain in session and not to recess for more than just a few days. I believe that if Congress should adjurn with little opportunity to reassemble before next January that many serious things might happen, as it is very clear to me that the President is desirous of putting the country into the war. There is a lot of discussion among the people about the increase in the national-debt limit, and the voting of billions for defense, and that surely the expenditure of this vast sum should be closely supervised and scrutinized. I find very little criticism of the national-defense program, as the people generally feel that we should put ourselves in a state of defense, but they are interested in how effectively the money will be spent.

There is probably a more important side to the whole situation than the foregoing, and that is, that the people here seem more firmly convinced that under no circumstances should we enter the war in Europe, and they are looking to Congress to prevent the President from putting the country at war.

I thought you might like to have my views and the result of my observations here.

With kindest regards and best wishes, I am

Sincerely yours,

CHESTER STEVENS.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,

DEAR SENATOR: These are critical times in this country, and there no doubt is a great deal of pressure being put upon you from various angles.

In talking to a large number of people in Topeka, I find that most of them feel as I do, and that is that in the present emergency Congress should stay in session until this emergency is past. I urge you therefore to do whatever you can to see that Congress is not adjourned.

If the two bodies of Congress ever had a duty to perform, it would seem to me that they are facing it at present.

With kindest personal regards, I am

Yours very truly,

J. S. KRITSER, JR.

TOPEKA, KANS., June 13, 1940.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: I wish to add my voice to that of many others asking you to use all your influence with the powers that be to keep Congress in session during this world emergency. Also to give the President more power—which the adjournment of Congress would entail—would be undemocratic and un-American.

Yours truly,

HARRIET A. TOMSON.

M. G. STEVENSON,
Ashland, Kans., June 12, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Out this way we believe that the crisis now prevailing demands that Congress remain in session. By no means allow that occupant of the White House to have full sway in our defense preparations. I do not believe he is to be trusted. His great show of patriotism at this time is no credit to him as he had to be kicked into that position. The failure to use funds voted to Army and Navy for armament, stamps he and his advisers as disloyal, and I would not be surprised to know that it was prompted by the reds and pinks in his administration. If we win in the congressional elections, he should be stripped of all the powers given him by Congress that are not specifically conferred upon him by the Constitution.

Isn't there danger in shipping our guns, planes, etc., to the Allies at this time when it will take so long a time to replace them for our own protection? Isn't this some more of the boring from within? Personally I am for helping the Allies with everything we can except men, but I am uneasy about our own defense. There is no doubt that Hitler will bring the war to this side if he beats down France and England. But keep Congress in session.

Yours truly,

"STEVEY."

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: I hope you will use all of your influence to keep Congress in session. I feel that Congress should be a check upon the President, or we will be at war very soon. And I also believe the President feels that he is the only power in this country, and he must be held down.

I know you will use your influence to help keep a checkrein on him.

EVEREST, KANS., June 8, 1940.

Mr. ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CAPPER: I am writing my opinion of things concerning the war: Our boys belong here in the United States of America. We are all willing to defend our own country, but we won't stand for shipping them to foreign countries to be used as targets for Nazi bullets. We demand the right to vote on this matter which concerns us so seriously. We are strongly opposed to compulsory military training and are asking you to do all things possible to keep those things from happening.

We have neighbors who are, or were, New Dealers; but not now. The Democrats as a whole don't trust the President any more than the Republicans trust him. He isn't honest with us and we don't trust his motives. He isn't so much concerned with defense plans as with getting his hands on those billions as an aid to his third-term election. The most important thing for our citizens now is to defeat him this fall and elect a man whom we think won't try to become a dictator. Unless we do we may find ourselves with the same form of government as Germany has; with no more voice in the governing of our affairs. We approve all you have been doing, Mr. Capper.

Please continue to work for the best interest of your countrymen.

Very truly,

H. C. BELL.

We favor Congress remaining in Washington, D. C.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,

DEAR SENATOR: Knowing that you have the interests of your constituents in mind at all times, we are writing asking that you stay on the job in Congress, regardless of pressure from the administration to do otherwise.

Our hope of safety is the strength of the Republican men in the Senate and House and the watchful eye of the American Legion at home. The New Deal has been such a great, grand fizzle since it assumed dictatorial powers the past 7 years, left us stranded on the verge of bankruptcy and war.

As public opinion is the most powerful weapon at our command, we wish to register ours at this time.

The women's Republican organization of our county met in their first meeting last Monday evening, with a large crowd and much interest shown in national as well as local affairs.

We expect to have regular meetings each month until after the election in November.

DEAR SENATOR: Our country is perhaps now going through a crisis as serious as any it has ever experienced. The soldiers and citizens each has an important work to do, but no less and perhaps more important is the work and policy of our Government as formulated by the duly elected and acting representatives. You are our protectors, and we are asking you to hold tenaciously to every right vested in you by our Constitution and the laws of our land. A delegation of any right is most dangerous even under normal condition.

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: As you probably know by now, the sentiment in this county is practically unanimous that the Congress stay in continuous session during this emergency.

Many people are of the opinion that you have no right whatever to quit your post at this time; that, insofar as we, the people, have been informed, your job is in Washington.

Many others think that Mr. Roosevelt should not be left alone. Not that he would get lonesome, but for the reason that he has shown himself to be incapable of intelligent leadership in times of peace. And now that war is just around the corner, it is thought that 500 heads are very much better than 1.

DEAR SIR: We have been watching the growing hysteria and tension in the United States, particularly noticeable in the press, which has been created by the European war. We believe that the greatest check upon Executive rashness lies in Congress, and to properly restrain dangerous activities and insure cool-headed action Congress should remain in session during the entire emergency.

Furthermore, we are opposed to United States entry into this European conflict. We are praying that you and other Members of Congress will approach the problems ahead with the very utmost caution. You will earn the gratitude of our friends as well as ourselves by making calm, intelligent decisions which do not further the interests of the few who stand to benefit or are easily stampeded but which consider the many to whom intervention would mean the sacrifice of everything in a futile European catastrophe.

DEAR SIR: President Roosevelt is gaining so much dictatorial power that in the near future I am of the opinion that anyone who disagrees with either his foreign or domestic policies, or who failed to vote for him will be considered a "fifth columnist" and a traitor to his country.

I am a loyal citizen, working for the interest of my country, which I don't think is being done altogether in Washington, D. C.

However, I certainly endorse your and Senator CLARK'S stand.

I urge you to try to keep Congress in continuous session and not to give the President any more dictatorial powers.

I always listen with interest to your Sunday afternoon program.

Do all in your power to keep us out of this war. As you always say, "This is not our war," which is correct.

Sincerely yours,

VIOLA BOCKELMAN.
GEORGE BOCKELMAN.

Mr. CAPPER. I also ask to have printed in the RECORD an excellent editorial from the Kansas City Star on the same subject urging the Congress to remain in session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

[From the Kansas City Star of June 12, 1940]

CONGRESS SHOULD NOT QUIT

Congress can't provide for national defense simply by voting billions of dollars and then going home and forgetting all about it while its Members race around in a political campaign trying to get themselves renominated and reelected.

Both the common defense and the general welfare demand that Congress stay on the job, maintain the proper balance of government, and complete the work laid out before it. The administration wants Congress to adjourn in a week or so and get out of Washington. This would be a breach of responsibility in such a crisis. The day-by-day decisions required ought to be made by the President in consultation with Congress, not by the President alone. In its full meaning defense is too big a task to be performed by the administration alone. Our foreign policy is too vital to be determined in the absence of Congress. If Congress adjourned, it could reassemble only at the call of the Executive. It cannot thus abdicate.

It has abdicated its authority and responsibility too often in past years. That is the course now to be checked. The work of defense will require a constant watchfulness. If it is to go forward speedily—as it must—it will require at various stages the advice and consent of the legislative branch of the Government. That advice and consent should be immediately available.

But in addition Congress has not completed its work, its own scheduled work. If it should quit within a week or so it would be running away from that work.

Adequate defense requires an efficient and smoothly functioning industry in the Nation. No obstacle should be left in the way. It has been widely demanded and in large part already agreed upon in Congress that various obstructive measures should be so revised as to aid rather than hold back industry. Included are the amendments to the Wagner Act already passed by a big majority in the House, the proposed amendments to the Wage and Hour and the Walsh-Healey Acts, with still other measures designed to promote industrial production to the fullest possible extent.

There are the further needs of the Hatch clean-politics bill in a campaign year and of the Logan-Walter bill to provide a check on the independent and quasi-judicial agencies in keeping with a democratic system.

Not one of these measures has been completed. Every one of them is as necessary today as it was weeks ago—even more essential, in fact.

Let Congress stand by its duty and go on with its job. It faces a test and a responsibility fully equal to that of the administration. It must perform in an hour of need.

REVENUE BILL OF 1940

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10039) to provide for the expenses of national preparedness by raising revenue and issuing bonds, to provide a method for paying for such bonds, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee on page 32, beginning in line 9.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I hope the amendment which has been reported by the Finance Committee will be rejected. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, I do not desire to take the time of the Senate to discuss the amendment on page 32 prohibiting the purchase by our Government of foreign silver further than to say that I expect to vote against including the amendment in the bill now pending. I do not want that vote, however, to be construed as indicating that I do not think the foreign silver-purchase policy of the Government is wrong. I think the Congress ought to stop it and I voted for this amendment when it passed the Senate in the form of a bill. I think the Congress ought to enact a separate law to that effect; but I do not think the amendment has any proper place in this tax bill, and for that reason I shall vote against it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee on page 32, beginning in line 9.

Mr. HARRISON, Mr. BARKLEY, and other Senators asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MALONEY (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], who has been compelled temporarily to leave the Chamber. If he were present and voting, he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. I am informed that if present he would vote as I intend to vote and that he has been specially paired on this question. Therefore I am at liberty to vote, and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HOLMAN (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. STEWART]. I am informed that if he were present he would vote "nay." I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], who, if present, would vote "yea," and let my vote stand.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR], who would vote "yea," with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], would vote "nay";

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON], who would vote "yea," with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], who would vote "nay";

The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], who would vote "yea," with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], who would vote "nay"; and

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who would vote "yea," with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. THOMAS], who would vote "nay."

Mr. McNARY. The senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is unavoidably absent. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, when this amendment in the form of a bill was before the Senate previously I voted for it, but I do not think it ought to be placed upon this tax bill. I vote "nay."

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. STEWART], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are necessarily absent from the Senate. I am advised that if present and voting the Senators named would vote "nay."

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] are detained in various Government departments. I am advised that if present and voting they would vote "nay."

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is unavoidably detained. I am advised that if present and voting he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 46, as follows:

YEAS—35

Ashurst	Clark, Mo.	La Follette	Taft
Austin	Danaher	Lodge	Tobey
Bailey	Davis	Lundeen	Townsend
Bridges	Donahey	McNary	Tydings

NOT VOTING—15

Barbour	Gibson	McKellar	Thomas, Idaho
Chavez	Glass	Maloney	Thomas, Okla.
Frazier	Johnson, Calif.	Pepper	Wheeler
George	Lucas	Stewart

So the amendment of the committee was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, at the top of page 33, to insert:

SEC. 403. The President is hereby authorized and directed to reduce appropriations for the executive branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941 (except appropriations for national defense, fixed charges, and trust funds), in such manner that the total amount of such reductions shall not be less than 10 percent of the total amount of the appropriations affected. Such reductions in appropriations shall be impounded and returned to the Treasury.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I have been requested by several Senators to make an explanation with respect to the effect of the pending amendment.

The amendment provides for the reduction of nondefense expenditures by 10 percent.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to ask the Senator from Virginia if the amendment applies to salaries of employees, to compensation of ex-service men, and old-age pensions.

Mr. BYRD. I will say to the Senator that the interpretation given by the Budget Bureau and the Treasury Department is that it does not apply to any of them. I shall make that very clear in the remarks I am about to make.

Mr. McKELLAR. It does not apply to any one of them?

Mr. BYRD. It does not, nor to the salaries set forth in the Classification Act, which are regarded as fixed charges.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am in full sympathy with the Senator's proposal, with the exception that I should not want it to apply to those matters.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield?

Mr. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On that point, is it not contemplated that reductions in total pay rolls will be obtained through the device of furloughing employees?

Mr. BYRD. I will say to the Senator that of course that depends on whether or not the total reduction required under the amendment cannot be obtained from other sources. I will frankly say that the amendment does give the President authority to inaugurate furloughs; and a large saving likewise may be effected by not filling positions which become vacant during the next year.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator will further permit me, in other words, it is not contemplated that the classified civil-service employees will have any reduction in salary, but large numbers of them may be deprived of their salaries altogether.

Mr. BYRD. The Bureau of the Budget and the Treasury Department think that is not an accomplished fact. There may be some furloughs, but not of any great consequence.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, would those who may be furloughed be given the first opportunity to secure positions in the places created under the defense activities?

Mr. BYRD. I certainly think such opportunity should be given.

Mr. President, this country is faced with providing for the tremendous cost of armaments. No one can predict what that cost may be. Some have predicted that it will be as much as $20,000,000,000, and it must be very evident to everyone that we cannot continue to pyramid the costs of the armament facing us upon the deficit which now exists in the ordinary expenditures of the Government.

There are only three ways by which we can provide for this additional expenditure. One is by reducing the nondefense and nonessential expenditures of the Government, and diverting the savings to national defense. The second method is to increase taxes. The third method is to increase the bonded indebtedness of the country. I realize, of course, that we must use all three methods, but it seems to me that in the great emergency which confronts the Nation we should endeavor to eliminate for the period of the emergency all nonessential, nondefense expenditures so that the money thus liberated can be spent on the essential purposes of our national defense.

Let me read the amendment to the Senate, so that it may be thoroughly understood:

The President is hereby authorized and directed to reduce appropriations for the executive branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941 (except appropriations for national defense, fixed charges, and trust funds), in such manner that the total amount of such reductions shall not be less than 10 percent of the total amount of the appropriations affected.

Mr. President, this amendment does not require a horizontal cut, it requires that the total of all nondefense appropriations, as interpreted by the President, shall be reduced to the extent of 10 percent.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. As I understand the provision contained in the amendment, the President would be authorized to wipe out any appropriation in full. There is not to be a horizontal cut of 10 percent of each appropriation. It would be left to the President to leave intact one appropriation, to wipe out entirely some other appropriation, and to reduce another appropriation by 50 percent. In other words, the President would be authorized to do what he pleased to do with any appropriation, with the instruction that he should make reductions which would be equivalent to 10 percent of the total of the nondefense appropriations. Is that correct?

Mr. BYRD. The amendment provides that the total of nondefense appropriations, after eliminating national defense, fixed charges, and trust funds, shall be reduced by 10 percent. The President would have the power so to distribute the reductions as to do the least damage and to cause the least interruption of the normal activities of the Government.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, I should like to make a suggestion to the able Senator from Virginia. I think the purpose contained in the amendment could be served by providing, instead of giving this full blanket authorization to the President, that in no case shall any appropriation be reduced more than 25 percent. It seems to me that would give the President sufficient leeway. He could reduce an appropriation up to 25 percent, and no more than that. Then other appropriations he could not touch at all. But I do not think it is necessary to give the President, or anyone else, authority to wipe out entirely appropriations made by the Congress.

The nondefense appropriations, some of which may not be so very essential, have been very carefully considered by the Committees on Appropriations of the House and of the Senate, and carefully considered by both Houses. To vest authority in the President, after this careful consideration, to eliminate entirely an appropriation within his discretion, I think is going further than is necessary to go.

The purpose back of the amendment advocated by the Senator from Virginia can be carried out by authorizing the President to make a reduction which would be equivalent to 10 percent of the total nondefense appropriations, but at the same time not reducing any appropriation more than 25 percent. I offer that as a suggestion, and I expect later to offer an amendment to that effect.

Mr. BYRD. The very clear answer to that is that there are some appropriations which should either be utilized 100 percent or not be used at all. Let us take, for instance, some of the public-works appropriations. If they are reduced by 25 percent, perhaps the money will not be sufficient for the construction of public buildings, or for whatever else the money may be appropriated.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. What is the Senator's interpretation of the fixed charges, which are exempt?

Mr. BYRD. I am coming to that now. I have a statement from the Bureau of the Budget and the Treasury Department giving their interpretation of the fixed charges.

Mr. BARKLEY. This provision is not merely an authorization; it is mandatory. The President is required to make such reductions as that the total cut shall be 10 percent, so that he would have to go elsewhere if he found it impossible to reduce any expenditures, for instance, in the State Department, which I think would be very likely, or in the Department of Justice, which I think very likely. I do not see how there can be any reduction in either of those departments under present conditions; yet they are not part of the national defense; so that he would have to go elsewhere and reduce some other appropriation by more than 10 percent in order to reach an average of 10. Likewise I wish to ask the Senator whether, under his interpretation and as the Budget Bureau has indicated, it would affect the relief appropriations already made. It would be necessary either to reduce relief appropriations which were made a few days ago, or find enough somewhere else to cut out in order to make the average 10 percent. If it cannot be found elsewhere, and there is some department in connection with which the President cannot make any reduction, it might result in a greater reduction in the relief appropriations than 10 percent in order to arrive at the average of 10. Is that true?

Mr. BYRD. I do not think that is necessarily true. If the Senator will permit me to give the items which are not subject to cut, I think it will be clear.

The chairman of the Committee on Finance, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], and I had a conference with Mr. Bell, the Under Secretary of the Treasury; Mr. Smith, the Director of the Budget; and Mr. Lawton, who is associated with the Bureau of the Budget, I think. These gentlemen cooperated in drawing the language of the amendment. I do not mean to commit them to the policy involved, because they have no authority, of course, to commit the administration with respect to a policy; but they, in fact, largely prepared the amendment, and they have advised the Senator from Mississippi and me that it is workable in its language, and that the savings anticipated, in their judgment, could be derived. They have given to me a memorandum of the items which are not subject to reduction. First is the interest on the public debt, $1,100,000,000.

The second is veterans' pensions, $460,000,000, the reason being that the veterans' pensions are fixed by act, and therefore they are construed to be a fixed charge, under the terms of the amendment.

The retirement funds, such as the railroad-retirement funds and other funds, amounting to $225,000,000.

Next is social-security grants—grants which are made to the States for old-age pensions and other matters, whereby the Federal Government has become obligated, are regarded as a fixed charge, to the extent of $400,000,000.

The payments to farmers under the Soil Conservation Act, under contracts which have already been made and will, of course, have to be performed by the Government, $450,000,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does that $450,000,000 include the $212,000,000 contained in the agricultural appropriation bill recently passed?

Mr. BYRD. It does not include the so-called parity payments, but it does include what are known as the soil-conservation benefit payments, because contracts have been made with the farmers for the expenditure of that money.

Public roads are exempted under this amendment, in the opinion of the Budget Director and the Treasury Department, because contracts have already been made with the States for the expenditure of $170,000,000 for public roads in the coming year.

There are certain P. W. A. grants which have been obligated. In other words, the Government has made a definite committal for these grants to the extent of $125,000,000.

Tax refunds, of course, are not subject to reduction, and they amount to $71,000,000.

Miscellaneous grants of $72,000,000 would be exempted.

The total exempted, therefore, under the item of fixed charges, is $3,083,000,000, according to the memorandum which has been given me by the Bureau of the Budget.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nevada will permit me, I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia whether the Budget has submitted a list of the appropriations which will be affected by the 10 percent cut.

Mr. BYRD. I have given the exemptions.

Mr. BARKLEY. I was wondering whether they also itemized the appropriations which could be cut.

Mr. BYRD. I can give the Senator, shortly, somewhat of a rough analysis of it, but the items I have indicated are exempted from the cut in the appropriation bills.

Mr. PITTMAN. There is no doubt that the subject on which we have now entered will involve considerable debate. The Senator from Virginia is beginning his speech. I wish to present a report before the Senator begins his speech.

Mr. BYRD. I have no objection to yielding to the Senator from Nevada for the purpose of making a report.

Mr. PITTMAN. It will take 5 or 10 minutes to explain the matter to which I refer. It is an emergency matter.

Mr. BYRD. Will the Senator from Nevada permit me to finish this formal explanation with respect to salaries, regarding which I have received many inquiries? The Director of the Budget and Mr. Bell, of the Treasury Department, have assured the Senator from Mississippi and myself that they will regard as fixed expenses any salaries which are set forth by law, which include all salaries fixed by the Classification Act.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I notice in the list submitted to the Senator, which he has read as being appropriations for departments exempted from the effects of his amendment, that the Bureau of the Budget, or whoever was consulted, did not specifically name salaries.

Mr. BYRD. The list which was given me was the list of items. Of course the salaries are included.

Mr. McCARRAN. Before the Senator from Virginia concludes I wish he would refer to the colloquy which occurred on May 31 between him and me, when he introduced this amendment or one in substance like it. On page 11029 of the RECORD the following appears:

> Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, does the amendment mean a reduction in the pay of Federal employees?
> Mr. BYRD. It means a reduction in the pay of Federal employees provided the 10-percent reduction cannot be absorbed by other reductions and economies in the respective departments.
>
> Mr. McCARRAN. I will oppose with everything in my being a reduction in the pay of Federal employees, because I think they are the most underpaid workers in the United States today.
> Mr. BYRD. It also provides for a reduction of salaries of Senators and Representatives by 10 percent.

I wish to draw the Senator's attention to that colloquy in order that he may discuss it in connection with the fact that the authorities he has quoted to the Senate do not eliminate Federal employees.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the amendment referred to by the Senator from Nevada is entirely a different amendment from the one subsequently introduced by the Senator from Virginia. The amendment to which the Senator refers provided for a horizonal reduction of 10 percent in the appropriations of each executive department of the Government, not relating to national defense, and should that amendment have been adopted it would have meant, of course, that those departments which could not absorb the reduction by the postponement of public works or in some other way, would have been required to bring about a reduction in salaries. I was perfectly frank with the Senator in making that statement.

Furthermore, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia provided for reduction in legislative appropriations, and had that been agreed to by Congress naturally there would have been a reduction of 10 percent in the salaries of Representatives and Senators, because there are no other items contained in the legislative appropriation than salaries. But the pending amendment is an entirely different amendment, because it directs the President to cut the over-all or lump-sum appropriations for nondefense purposes, which gives him the discretion to reduce those appropriations which he thinks can best be reduced in this time of great national emergency.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. When the Senator read the appropriations which would be exempt from the provisions of his amendment, he did not specifically mention appropriations for the payment of subsidies for slum clearances. As the Senator knows, those are obligations assumed by the United States Government for the period of time provided in the contract. So I take it they must be included in the exemption.

Mr. BYRD. Among the exempted items are miscellaneous grants of $72,000,000, and no doubt the appropriation for slum clearance is in that amount. I agree with the Senator from New York that the slum-clearance appropriation is in the same classification as the appropriation for public roads.

Mr. WAGNER. So it is not the intent of the Senator, of course, to affect those obligations in any way by his amendment?

Mr. BYRD. Not if an obligation has been made by the Government.

Mr. WAGNER. I am speaking of obligations already entered into.

Mr. BYRD. With respect to the matter of salaries, Mr. President, the chairman of the Finance Committee, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], and, if necessary, any other Senator, can communicate with the Bureau of the Budget or the Treasury Department. We were told by the officials of these departments that any salaries fixed by law would be regarded as fixed charges in the sense that the Congress, by a measure of this character, could not reduce those salaries unless the Classification Act was amended. We all recall that in 1933, when salaries were reduced, they were reduced by a direct amendment of the Classification Act. The legal authorities whom I have consulted are of the opinion that there can be no reduction of salaries unless the Classification Act is amended. There are three classes of salaries, so far as I have been able to ascertain——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. Can the Senator state roughly what percentage of Federal positions are covered by the Classification Act?

Mr. BYRD. I will make that clear. There are three classes of salaries. One is the salaries of post-office employees, customs officers, immigration officers, school teachers and several other groups, which are fixed within limits respectively by special pay statutes. This information has been given me by the Civil Service Commission. These special pay statutes are regarded by the Bureau of the Budget as imposing fixed charges, and therefore not susceptible to reduction under this amendment.

Then there is another class of salaries of a relatively few emergency agencies that come within the limitations which by Executive order can be changed whenever the President chooses. Those salaries could be reduced under this amendment, but the President already has the authority to reduce them. He can reduce them now if he chooses. Employees receiving such salaries constitute only a small percentage of the employees of the Federal Government, mostly in the higher brackets, and mostly employed in some of the emergency agencies.

Virtually all other salaries are determined by the Salary Classification Act, which fixes a scale of pay based upon classifications, and it has been ruled, as I said, by the Bureau of the Budget and the Treasury Department, that they would not be legally permitted to reduce those salaries under the language of the amendment.

I am frank to say that if it is impossible to reduce the expenditures in the amount provided in the amendment, by the postponing temporarily of public works or in some other way, there may be some necessity for furloughs, but I am advised by the Bureau of the Budget that a large saving can be effected by not filling vacancies that may occur in the next year.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask the Senator to yield so I may ask him a question at that point.

Mr. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The list which he read a moment ago from the Bureau of the Budget covering the exempted appropriations, aggregated about three billion and one-half dollars. Is that correct? Has the Senator exact figures?

Mr. BYRD. Three billion eighty-three million dollars.

Mr. BARKLEY. A little over $3,000,000,000. The appropriations for national defense amount, I believe, to more than over $5,000,000,000, but still by the time we finish——

Mr. BYRD. The appropriations for national defense included in these figures amount to $3,300,000,000. Those are the appropriations for national defense up to 2 or 3 days ago when these figures were obtained.

Mr. BARKLEY. We will soon have before us a $1,700,000,000 bill which is now in the Appropriations Committee. We have been roughly estimating our appropriations for national defense at $5,000,000,000. That would make the amount a little over $8,000,000,000 in all. How much will be left upon which this 10-percent reduction must be applied after all the items referred to by the Senator have been exempted?

Mr. BYRD. The Bureau of the Budget estimates that there will be left $4,372,000,000 susceptible of a reduction under the terms of this amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. So, in order to carry out the Senator's amendment, the President would have to make such reductions here and there where he could as to make an aggregate reduction of approximately $400,000,000?

Mr. BYRD. The aggregate would be $430,000,000, but the Bureau of the Budget thinks that reduction can reach a total of $500,000,000, because the language of the amendment is that there shall be a reduction of not less than 10 percent.

Mr. BARKLEY. Let me ask the Senator another question. Of course, he has no break-down of this $4,000,000,000, or whatever the exact amount is.

Br. BYRD. I can give the Senator the break-down very roughly. The first items subject to reduction are the administrative costs of the different executive departments of the Government, which aggregate approximately $945,000,000.

There has been a tremendous increase in the cost of the executive departments since 1930. I have the figures before me. Let us take just one item. The independent offices and commissions are today costing $274,000,000, while in 1930 they cost $92,000,000. Their cost today is nearly three times as much as in 1930. Similar increases have been made in all the other departments of the Government.

Mr. BARKLEY. Permit me to make an inquiry there. The administrative expenses consist very largely of salaries. I suppose there are other items, but the regular department administrative expenses are largely made up of salaries. I called attention a moment ago to the impossibility of any reduction in the State Department. Does the Senator agree to that suggestion?

Mr. BYRD. I agree that the State Department cannot be reduced, but, as a matter of fact, that is a small expenditure. It is only $19,000,000 in all.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator also agree to the suggestion that probably salaries in the Department of Justice cannot be reduced?

Mr. BYRD. I agree to that. That is in the memorandum of the Bureau of the Budget. The salaries in the Department of Justice are $39,000,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. There may be others, but those two occurred to me. Of the $4,000,000,000 plus which would be subject to the reduction, practically one-fourth is represented by the relief appropriation. How much are the parity payments which the Senator says will be subject to the reduction?

Mr. BYRD. The total appropriations for the purpose of the agricultural adjustment program, until the amendment to the relief bill was adopted the other day, were $862,000,000. From that sum $450,000,000 will be exempted for the A. A. A., for payments on contracts which have already been made.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is under the soil-conservation program.

Mr. BYRD. That is under the soil-conservation program; but under the terms of my amendment there will be subject to reduction a proportionate share, or whatever part the President may deem proper, of the parity payments for 1941, which I am told are $210,000,000. The $165,000,000 fund for the disposal of surplus commodities will also be subject to reduction. Payments of $45,000,000 under the Sugar Act will also be subject to reduction.

Mr. BARKLEY. Three or four weeks ago, as I recall, we appropriated approximately $85,000,000 for the purchase of surplus commodities. One hundred million dollars was added to the relief bill the other day for that purpose. So those two items will be subject to a reduction of not less than 10 percent, or such part of it as would be necessary to make the average reduction 10 percent.

Mr. BYRD. The matter would be entirely in the discretion of the President.

Mr. BARKLEY. He would have to find as much as 10 percent, taking into consideration the aggregate of $4,000,000,000. So if he should find that in some department he could not make any reduction he would be required to reduce more than 10 percent somewhere else in order to make the average not less than 10 percent.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, there is a very substantial sum for public works. Public highways, as I have said, are exempted; but the total for public works in the present Budget is $789,000,000. In his veto message on the river and harbor bill the other day the President recognized the necessity, at this time of great crisis, of postponing public works and letting the money go for national defense. He said this:

> Regardless of every other consideration, it seems to me that the nonmilitary activities of the War Department should give way at this time to the need for military preparedness. This is a need, not so apparent at the time the bill was under consideration by the Congress, that must now be recognized by all as a matter demanding priority of attention.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the $800,000,000 for public works include anything in the Public Works Administration proper, for uncompleted contracts?

Mr. BYRD. It does; but there is an exemption of $125,000,000 for P. W. A.

Mr. BARKLEY. That would reduce to $650,000,000 the amount of public-works funds upon which the 10-percent reduction would operate.

Mr. BYRD. That is correct.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. Can the Senator tell us to what agencies of the Government the $600,000,000 has been appropriated?

Mr. BYRD. The Tennessee Valley Authority, $40,000,000; reclamation, $59,000,000; river and harbor improvements, $50,000,000; flood control, $121,000,000; public buildings, $59,000,000; grants to public bodies, $113,000,000; and other public works, $155,000,000.

Mr. RUSSELL. Some of those items could be classed as defense items and exempted from the reduction, could they not?

Mr. BYRD. The memorandum prepared by the Budget Bureau, which I have read, exempts $125,000,000 of P. W. A. funds and miscellaneous grants of $72,000,000.

Mr. RUSSELL. It occurs to me that the President might say that some features of the Tennessee Valley Authority and of river and harbor work are certainly very important parts of national defense.

Mr. BYRD. If the President should so rule, they would be completely exempted from the reduction, and the money would not have to be made up in any other way, because the items would be exempted from the nondefense appropriations.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator states that no salaries of Federal employees who are in the classified service would be reduced.

Mr. BYRD. That is the ruling of the Budget Bureau and of the Treasury Department.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am in favor of the theory of the Senator's amendment; but it seems to me that he has excluded and exempted until he has placed all the burden of the reduction squarely on the agricultural program and on the relief bill, they being the only items which would be clearly out in the open and subject to the cut.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, let us discuss the farmers. I know how interested the Senator from Georgia is in that matter. The farmers are exempted to the extent of one-half of the new appropriations which they have been receiving. In 1930 and 1931 not one dollar of these new appropriations went to the farmers. As the Senator knows, one-half of the $800,000,000 which they now receive is exempted. At this time of great national crisis, I think the farmers of the country are willing to make their contribution to prepare the Nation for any emergency which may occur.

Mr. RUSSELL. I think the farmers are as patriotic as any other class of people, and perhaps more patriotic than some classes; but the Senator is asking them to be more patriotic than other classes. The Federal employee will not have his salary reduced.

Mr. BYRD. The Senator does not understand. Of the $4,000,000,000 only 10 percent consists of agricultural appropriations, which can be considered for reduction. Only about $400,000,000 can be considered.

Mr. RUSSELL. But the burden may all be placed on the farmers if the President sees fit to do so.

Mr. BYRD. All the $400,000,000 could come from the farmers if the President saw fit to take it from that source; but I do not think the President would see fit to do so. The Senator says that only 10 percent is put on the backs of the farmers. I have heard him make that statement time and time again. Of the total amount subject to reduction, only 10 percent comes from the farmers' appropriations.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator is familiar with the fact that practically every item subject to reduction has the benefit of a Budget estimate except the agricultural items. The President did not send to Congress any Budget estimate for parity payments. He did not send any Budget estimate for the supplemental funds under section 32.

Mr. BYRD. It may be that there will be no necessity for parity payments. The prices of wheat, cotton, and the other essentials used in this great conflict may go up.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. Has the Senator been keeping up with the prices of farm commodities for the past few weeks?

Mr. BYRD. I will say to the Senator that I happen to be a farmer. I know something about the prices of farm commodities.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. RUSSELL. Would the Senator be willing to accept an amendment to this section which would provide that the President may not reduce any item by more than 20 percent, or which would establish some limitation whereby all the burden could not be imposed on any single appropriation?

Mr. BYRD. In the case of public works it would be a foolish thing to provide 75 percent of the cost of a building. The building could not be built with 75 percent of its cost. Either it must be completely built or not built at all. I am willing to trust the President of the United States in this matter. We have trusted him to spend billions of dollars in lump-sum appropriations.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am willing to trust the President of the United States, but I disagree with him on some of his ideas as to Budget estimates. I am perfectly willing to trust him, but I did not agree with him that Budget estimates should be made for some items, but not for parity payments.

Mr. BYRD. I do not think I have made myself clear. The amendment proposed by me simply eliminates fixed charges. The exemptions which I have just read are what the Budget Bureau regards as fixed charges. There are no exemptions by name in the amendment, if the Senator will read it.

Mr. RUSSELL. I understand that; but the classification is very broad. The classification is for national defense. Many of the items which the Senator mentioned as being subject to the cut could, in the discretion of the President, be classified as national-defense items; but nobody could say that section 32 funds or parity payments are national-defense items.

Mr. BYRD. If every Senator is to insist upon the exemption of appropriations in which he is particularly interested, there is no need for talking about economy or trying to obtain money for defense purposes from nondefense appropriations. We cannot cut great sums out of the Budget without creating hardships somewhere. Everybody knows that. However, even after the cut is made, we shall be spending twice as much for nondefense purposes as we spent when President Roosevelt took office. If we eliminate every dollar for defense purposes, after making the 10-percent cut we shall be spending twice as much for the administration of the Federal Government as we spent when the Democratic administration came into power.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am in favor of economy. I have not been as consistent in that respect as has the Senator from Virginia, who, of course, has been the great economizer of the Congress. He has been consistent during his entire tenure of office.

Mr. BYRD. I appreciate the statement of the Senator, although I do not deserve it.

Mr. RUSSELL. However, I do not propose, under the guise of economy, to vote for any measure which will have the sole effect of repealing appropriations made by the Congress for one class of people. If the Senator wants to economize all down the line, including a 10-percent reduction in salaries, I am willing to go along with him, but I do not propose to support any proposal for reductions when the Senator's own statement shows that in the last analysis the entire burden of the 10-percent reduction, which is mandatory, will fall on agricultural appropriations and upon relief appropriations, which are designed for those most in need.

The Senator says he is willing to trust the President. I notice that he proposes to make the 10-percent cut mandatory. He does not propose a 10-percent permissive cut, which the President might apply if he saw fit. The President is directed to make a cut of 10 percent.

Mr. BYRD. There would be no need of Congress passing an authorization for the President to make a reduction if he saw fit to do so. He already has the power to withhold appropriations.

Mr. RUSSELL. Why does the Senator object to an amendment which would afford some measure of protection to certain appropriations providing that they may not be cut more than 20 or 25 percent?

Mr. BYRD. To answer the Senator from Georgia with respect to the farmers, there is $862,000,000 in the last Budget for the purpose of administration of what is known as the agricultural adjustment program. There was not a cent in the Budget of 1930, 1931, or 1932 for that purpose. I am not saying there should not have been. However, that is a new expenditure.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator would not want us to go back to the condition of agriculture which existed in 1931 and 1932, would he?

Mr. BYRD. Certainly not; but of the $862,000,000, half is exempted under the soil-conservation program. Those payments are regarded by the Budget Bureau as a fixed charge, because contracts have been made. That leaves about $400,000,000 subject to reduction, and that is only 10 percent of the total amount which is subject to reduction. When the Senator says that all the burden is falling upon the farmer I think he does the President a great injustice when he assumes that the President will take the $400,000,000 in toto from the one source. He may take part of it. Probably he will be compelled to take part of it.

Mr. RUSSELL. I did not make any such suggestion. I said that if substantial economies were effected in those appropriations, from the very force of circumstances, as outined by the Senator, they would have to come out of the agricultural items and out of the relief bill, because no other large sums exist which the President can impound.

Mr. BYRD. The Senator has completely omitted public works. The President says that such things should be postponed in this day of emergency.

Mr. RUSSELL. What public works already authorized did the President say ought to be postponed? I know he vetoed the river and harbor bill.

Mr. BYRD. He vetoed the river and harbor bill, and stated as his policy that:

> Regardless of every other consideration, it seems to me that the nonmilitary activities of the War Department should give way at this time to the need for military preparedness. This is a need, not so apparent at the time the bill was under consideration by the Congress, that must now be recognized by all as a matter demanding priority of attention.

Mr. RUSSELL. Does the Senator know how much of the public-works program has not been obligated or for which contracts have not been entered into? We have made no public-works appropriations recently of any size.

Mr. BYRD. I have read that the P. W. A. grants which have been obligated are $125,000,000; miscellaneous grants, $72,000,000. I have not the itemized statement of the miscellaneous grants.

I will give the complete total: Public highways $192,000,000. The Budget Bureau has given the contracts which have been made with the States next year for public highways, and they are therefore exempted.

The amount for the Tennessee Valley Authority is $40,000,000. If the President should construe that as a defense appropriation, then it would not be subject to the reduction.

Reclamation, $59,000,000.

Rivers and harbors, $50,000,000.

Flood control, $121,000,000.

Public buildings, $59,000,000.

Grants to public bodies, $113,000,000; other grants $155,000,000.

Mr. RUSSELL. Does the Senator know of what those two items consist?

Mr. BYRD. The estimate given to me by the Bureau of the Budget says that $125,000,000 of P. W. A. funds have been pledged and $72,000,000 of miscellaneous grants have been pledged. So there is a broad field there.

Some of these expenditures, as the Senator says, may be regarded as defense expenditures. That being the case, they are removed from the category of expenditures it is necessary to reduce.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BILBO in the chair). Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia if he has any tentative tables or break-downs which would show from what sources this saving is to come?

Mr. BYRD. I have attempted to give that. I will start over again.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I realize the Senator has itemized certain categories of expenditures which he has been informed by the Budget Bureau would be subject to reductions if this amendment should prevail; but what I am anxious to know is, has the Senator any estimate which would show what, in the opinion of the Budget Bureau, could be saved out of these other items and, therefore, what proportion of the cut would fall upon agricultural appropriations and upon appropriations for relief?

Mr. BYRD. I have no definite itemized statement. I have the statement made by the President on June 3 that plans were being made to reduce by 10 percent the nondefense spending, which will result in $500,000,000 of saving.

That was announced in the newspapers. I do not assume that the studies have gone so far as to enable an itemized statement to be given of these different matters today. It would hardly be reasonable to expect that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Can the Senator, then, give us a break-down which will show what proportion of the expenditures which have been listed in various categories will be eliminated because they are connected with national defense?

Mr. BYRD. That, of course, would have to be approximate. I can say, first, that the administrative expenses for the departments of the Government are about $945,000,000. I, for one, believe there can be some economies in the Government; I, for one, believe we have too much personnel working for the Government; I, for one, believe we can save money by not filling vacancies as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget has said. I have stated that if we went into all the Government departments we would find that very substantial savings could be made without disturbing any function of the Government, without disturbing the efficient administration of the departments.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Assuming——

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will not interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin at the moment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I merely wish to say that, if I understand the Senator from Virginia, there could be, in his estimation, approximately $78,000,000 saved out of administrative expenses.

Mr. BYRD. Of course it is unfair to me to be required to state how much could be saved by a reduction in administrative expenses of the departments. That would take a most exhaustive investigation. I do say, however, that money can be saved there.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then, the amount I have suggested would be the maximum required by the Senator's amendment. Is that a fair statement?

Mr. BYRD. Nine hundred and forty-five million dollars is the amount of the expenditures of the executive departments.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then, the saving would be $94,000,000 if a 10-percent reduction were made.

Mr. BYRD. If 10 percent should be taken out of $945,000,000, of course, it would be $94,000,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It would be $94,000,000, and not $500,000,000. What I am trying to get from the Senator, if I can, is some understanding of what proportion, making the most favorable assumptions possible, would be left to fall upon the agricultural appropriations and upon relief?

TRANSPORTATION OF RED CROSS RELIEF SUPPLIES

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BYRD. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. I thank the Senator for yielding to me.

From the Committee on Foreign Relations, I report back, with an amendment, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 279) to amend section 4 of Public Resolution No. 54, approved November 4, 1939, entitled "Joint resolution to preserve the neutrality and the peace of the United States and to secure the safety of its citizens and their interests," and I submit a report (No. 1875) thereon.

Mr. President, an emergency situation has arisen with regard to the Red Cross. The steamship McKeesport, supported and operated by the Red Cross, is 2 days out from the port of New York. It is loaded with, probably, half a million dollars' worth of medical supplies and certain characters of food for relief in France. It was discovered, however, probably after the vessel left, that it was totally impossible to get safe conduct from all the belligerent countries. The Neutrality Act requires that Red Cross vessels may operate to belligerent countries—that is the exception in the Neutrality Act—provided they get safe conduct from all the belligerents.

It happens at present that there are three belligerents who are named in the President's proclamation whose business address at the present time is not known. It is totally impossible to get in communication with them in order to get their grant of safe conduct to this vessel. The vessel, therefore, is not going to Bordeaux, but is going to Bilbao, Spain.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. May I suggest that if the Senator desires to take this proposal up at this time, it might be of benefit to the Senate if he would first secure unanimous consent to do so, and then permit a quorum to be called, so that all Senators could be present to listen to his explanation.

Mr. PITTMAN. I shall follow practically the course the Senator suggests; but I thought it would be desirable to make an explanation before I asked unanimous consent, because it is rather extraordinary to ask unanimous consent to act on a report from a committee without the report going to the calendar. So, I thought I would first try to explain the matter briefly and then ask if there was objection.

To proceed, Germany was communicated with and said that so far as the ship going across to Bordeaux was concerned, it would not be disturbed by the German Government, but that Government said "When it gets into the harbor of Bordeaux, we cannot guarantee its safety in that harbor." They said, "That harbor may be mined; we may be bombing that harbor; and, therefore, while we will do nothing to it directly, we cannot guarantee its safety."

Of course the situation has changed somewhat since the German Government made that reply, but, nevertheless, it is obvious that the requirement of the act as to "proceeding under safe conduct granted by States named in any proclamation issued under the authority of section 1 (a)," is totally impossible and, unless we are going to abandon any attempt at Red Cross relief in Europe, there will have to be a change in it. The change that is proposed is simply to strike from the act the words:

> Proceeding under safe conduct granted by States named in any proclamation issued under the authority of section 1 (a).

An amendment was offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] proposing to add these words after the word "vessel:"

> Shall not prohibit the transportation by any vessel armed and not under convoy.

I may state in that connection——

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BYRD. I have the floor, and if this matter is of an emergency character, I am glad to yield the floor to the Senator for a while.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not think it will take over 4 or 5 minutes. I thought that the matter should be explained, though, as I intend to ask unanimous consent later.

Mr. BYRD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I just entered the Chamber, and am not aware of what has taken place, but I can say to the able Senator from Nevada that there will have to be a roll call whatever the proposal is; then there must be an explanation made. If the Senator is asking unanimous consent, and is about to make his explanation, rather than make two, he could make one, and that should follow a roll call. I suggest, if he has the floor now, and if he wants to proceed in a logical and orderly way, that there should be a roll call, and then the Senator can make his proposal to those who are assembled after proper notice.

Mr. PITTMAN. That would be satisfactory to me.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia yielded to the Senator from Nevada to present a report. The Senator from Oregon suggests the absence of a quorum, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Bankhead	Brown	Capper
Andrews	Barkley	Bulow	Caraway

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, it is my purpose in a few moments to ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside in order that the Senate may consider Senate Joint Resolution 279. I should expect an objection unless a good reason were presented why this should be done. It is quite an extraordinary thing to ask.

However, yesterday the State Department conferred with me, and placed in my hands a joint resolution for the purpose of amending section 4 of the Neutrality Act with regard to the American Red Cross. It seems that the Red Cross has a vessel, the McKeesport, 2 days out from New York, carrying a very large cargo of Red Cross material intended for use in France. The Red Cross officials thought they could get a safe conduct through Bordeaux. Mind you, section 4 of the Neutrality Act requires that before Red Cross vessels may go to a belligerent port they must have a grant of safe conduct by all the belligerent powers named by the President in his proclamation.

We had the Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Long, and Mr. Norman Davis, president of the Red Cross, before us today. Of course France would grant a safe conduct. Germany has said they would not interfere with the ship at all, but by the time the McKeesport arrives in the harbor of Bordeaux that port might be in the process of being bombed by the Germans, or it might be mined, and therefore they could not grant safe conduct.

There is, however, a more difficult and impossible situation than that. One section of the Neutrality Act requires that all of the belligerent governments named in the President's proclamation shall also grant safe conduct. Mr. Long testified before us today that there were three of the governments whose officials they could not find even to communicate with them, namely, Belgium, Holland, and Norway, and therefore it is wholly impossible for American Red Cross ships to go to any belligerent port with the language of section 4 in the law.

The situation now is that, not being able to get a grant of safe conduct from all these governments, the vessel has been routed to Bilbao, Spain, which is a neutral port, but both Mr. Long and Mr. Norman Davis have doubts as to whether the relief materials on the vessel can be successfully carried through Spain into France for distribution. If they cannot, and they cannot be taken into any other belligerent port, there appears to be nothing for the vessel to do except to return to the United States.

With the language to which I have referred eliminated, if they could do nothing else, they could probably run into London or Liverpool, or some other port, and use for relief these goods which have been purchased by the American people, and are being shipped over there, and are badly needed.

It might be possible that they would be able to go into Bordeaux, under the changed situation which exists, provided they can go into a belligerent port without the necessity of a grant of safe conduct by all the belligerents.

Of course, it is an impossible situation. In the committee the use of this power without that restraint was fully discussed. It is evident that there is more danger attached to it than there would be if they had safe conduct from all the governments.

Mr. Davis was questioned by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] and others as to whether or not if he had the authority he would attempt to run a blockade. He said the answer to that would be certainly not, that he would not attempt such a thing as that.

There is another responsibility besides Mr. Norman Davis' responsibility in the matter. An American Red Cross vessel has no more right to go into a combat area than has any other American vessel, without the permission of the President of the United States. The President has to my knowledge granted only one permit to an American vessel to go within the broad combat areas he has established, and that was for the ships sent over to bring back citizens of the United States from the belligerent countries. That is the only exception the President has made. He certainly would not grant a permit to a Red Cross vessel to go into a combat area where there was a blockade or where there was any danger of the Red Cross vessel being sunk.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think the chairman of the committee will agree that the assurance given the committee by the Assistant Secretary of State, representing the State Department, was equally as strong as the assurance of the head of the American Red Cross that this power would not be used for the purpose of running a blockade. I may say that I had very great misgivings about this joint resolution, and still have some misgivings, but I think it is fair to say that the assurance on the part of the official representative of the State Department as to the use to be made of this power in case of a blockade was fully as strong as that of the head of the American Red Cross.

Mr. PITTMAN. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I should like to know what the term "running a blockade" means. Does it imply going in without previous arrangement, or what application is given that language?

Mr. PITTMAN. I certainly take it that if the governments involved should consent that a Red Cross ship could go in, as they did during the World War, that would not be running a blockade.

Mr. BONE. I can understand they would not run a blockade if there were a general understanding and consent that a ship might pass through.

Mr. PITTMAN. That was done during the World War, and it may be done again now.

Mr. BONE. I was constrained to propound the question because the joint resolution itself makes no reference textually to any such thing.

Mr. PITTMAN. No. That was involved in the discussion in the committee with the Assistant Secretary of State and the president of the Red Cross.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. I suppose that England is now in a state of blockade. Perhaps English ports are blockaded. At least Germany has been sinking every ship going in and coming out of English ports that she could sink, with submarines and airplanes, and very likely will intensify that so-called blockade. How would this joint resolution benefit the situation, under those conditions?

Mr. PITTMAN. It would not, if those conditions existed. Still, there are other countries where there is suffering. The Red Cross is trying to do something. There is no doubt at all that if any country is blockaded, either from the air or from the water, that would end it so far as the Red Cross was concerned, or so far as any of our vessels were concerned. We tried to exempt the Red Cross vessels, or vessels chartered and operated by the Red Cross, and carrying Red Cross materials, from the mandatory provision in section 2 (a) of the Neutrality Act, which makes it absolutely unlawful for an American vessel to go to any belligerent port. We desired, if there was no danger, to have a Red Cross ship go, so we put that language in the law, providing they could go when they were granted safe conduct by all the belligerent powers. That is impossible now, because some of the countries have not any official representatives. But the main protection comes from the President of the United States, after all. The vessels cannot go to any belligerent ports without going through combat areas, and no American vessel, whether it be a Red Cross vessel or not, can go into such an area without the permission of the President; and so far he has been very chary in giving his permission. He has made but one exception, that being as to our refugee ships. At that time he took every precaution to notify all the belligerent powers that those ships were refugee ships, that they were carrying nothing except food necessary to supply our citizens while they were being brought back.

There may be, and probably will be, a great restriction on the use of the Red Cross.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I notice that in the joint resolution the item of food has been included.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. McCARRAN. May we understand that that is food merely for those who are in the ship or who may return with the ship, or is it food to be delivered to the needy in the countries which may be visited by the ship?

Mr. PITTMAN. It is for both, as testified today by Mr. Norman Davis. He said that as a general thing the foodstuffs they carried were canned milk, and things such as that which children must have. They might even be prevented from delivering that kind of foodstuffs in some countries. There might be objection to them doing that. If there is objection, they will have to stop, that is all.

Mr. McCARRAN. I take it that the ship's manifest would show food included.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; it would show food.

Mr. McCARRAN. And if food is precluded by a blockade or a declaration of any belligerent nation, then that declaration would apply in regard to the item of food.

Mr. PITTMAN. It would, and the President would not be justified in allowing a ship to go through such a combat area, because it would involve a risk which the Congress does not intend shall be taken.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think the illustration of the point was brought out in the discussion this morning before the Committee on Foreign Relations, when Mr. Davis and Assistant Secretary Long testified that the Italian Government stated that they would like to see every item on the manifest before they would grant safe conduct. They did not object to the item of food, but they did state that under the Italian law soaps and motor vehicles were unconditional contraband, soap by reason of being a fat, and motor vehicles being contraband in every nation in the world.

The question was asked Mr. Davis and Mr. Long as to what would happen if an Italian ship should stop the Red Cross vessel and, after examining the manifest, confiscate the soap and the motor vehicles on the vessel. The reply was that the Red Cross would simply lose those items. In other words, there is no question of the right of a nation to seize unconditional contraband if it desires so to do. But the testimony this morning was that the Germans had raised no question as to the item of food. I wish to speak in my own time about the item of food in a few minutes; but the Germans raised no question about that, and it was agreed, apparently, on all sides in the Committee on Foreign Relations this morning, that if Italy or any other belligerent should stop the vessel on the ground that soap or motor vehicles, ambulances, and trucks for transportation of medical supplies, were contraband, and should take them off, there would simply be no question that the Red Cross would have to lose them. No international incident would be created by such a seizure. The chairman of the committee will agree with me in that statement, I am sure.

Mr. PITTMAN. Of course, the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri provides expressly that the vessel shall not be armed, or under convoy.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. If the ship in question should be sunk without being stopped, and if it carried what was known nationally or internationally as contraband, then what would be our position, inasmuch as the ship was carrying contraband?

Mr. PITTMAN. Of course, we could have no complaint if it were carrying contraband, providing it was sunk in accordance with international law—and I presume that is what the Senator means?

Mr. McCARRAN. Yes.

Mr. PITTMAN. Red Cross ships are marked all over with Red Cross insignia. Everyone is notified of the weight, the size, and the character of the ship. Everyone is notified that it is not armed. There is no excuse for a submarine sinking it without notice. That was not done during the World War, and I do not think it will be done by any nation which knows that the ship is a Red Cross ship. If the ship is legally searched and it is found to contain contraband, and the contraband should be confiscated, we could not complain. That is all there is to it.

The Red Cross realizes that it will be quite difficult to render relief to the millions of suffering people in Europe now by reason of the very extraordinary conditions in the war that is going on, and they will not attempt it except when they can do so in comparative safety.

Mr. McCARRAN. I take it that the ship in question carries the American flag. I take it that it carries the universal insignia of the Red Cross. If by any chance it should be sunk, there is nothing that would so incite the American people toward war, notwithstanding the fact that it might be proved that it carried contraband.

Mr. PITTMAN. There is no doubt about that. So far as I can see, there is no absolute safety in attempting to distribute relief to the refugees and wounded and suffering in the warring countries, and we must decide on one policy or the other—whether we shall attempt to render the aid, which it seems impossible can come from anywhere else, and possibly take some few little chances in connection with it, or whether we shall say we will not take any chances at all. I do not think there are as great chances of danger as some may think. I do not believe that any of the countries of the world today would deliberately sink a Red Cross ship. I have never known that to occur in all history. However, some of the things on the ship may be taken off the ship.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the joint resolution. However, I do not ask that action be taken on the request until others have spoken on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ELLENDER in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. McNARY. The request has been made, but that should not cut off the debate, and I ask that action on the request be postponed until the debate is concluded. I should prefer that the debate be concluded first.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; I ask that that be included in my request.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, there is no intention on my part to delay action on this proposal. If the Senate intends to act upon it, it must be acted upon immediately, because the need is great. In the Foreign Relations Committee, I believe I was the only one who opposed reporting the joint resolution to the Senate, and I want to make a statement with reference to my view on the matter.

The present neutrality law exempts from the prohibition against sending American vessels to belligerent ports after a Presidential proclamation has been made Red Cross vessels, or those which are under the control of the Red Cross and carrying Red Cross supplies, provided the belligerents themselves give approval. In this particular case the ship was cleared without having such approval from several of the belligerents. It is now probably 2 days out from Bordeaux. An attempt was made to secure approval or safe conduct from Germany and Italy. Germany stated, as was presented to the committee, and as referred to by the distinguished chairman of the committee, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], that she did not feel in a position to give safe conduct to Bordeaux because of the uncertain condition of the war situation at that point. Italy said that she could not do so.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think it should be emphasized that, so far as Germany was concerned, as the committee was informed this morning, Germany raised no question as to the character of the ship, or her willingness to permit the ship to pass across the seas.

Mr. GILLETTE. None whatever.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The suggestion of Germany was that she could not insure safe conduct because of the fact that Bordeaux might possibly be another Dunkerque, for instance, by the time the Red Cross ship arrived there. Therefore Germany could not grant safe conduct.

Italy raised objection on another ground. Italy said she would insist on a detailed copy of the manifest, and called attention to the fact that two articles which might be included—and which, in fact, are included—were unconditional contraband under Italian law.

Mr. GILLETTE. The Senator from Missouri is entirely correct. Germany took the position, and a perfectly reasonable position, that, because of the uncertain conditions, she could not give safe conduct or guarantee safe conduct, which she might not be in a position to enforce.

Italy refused to give safe conduct because under her law motor vehicles and soap, among other articles, are contraband, and they might be on the vessel's manifest. She therefore refused to give safe conduct. In response to my query, the witnesses before us said that those articles were on this boat.

The boat is now a couple of days out, bound for Bordeaux. It cannot go in without safe conduct. We are asked to adopt a joint resolution to obviate the necessity for that safe conduct. If we do so, and if the boat contains contraband articles, as it is said it does, which Italy refuses to clear, and proceeds on its voyage, and if Italy comes with a submarine or a cruiser or any other war vessel and insists on the right of search and confiscation of that material from a Red Cross boat, as has been suggested by the Senator from Nevada, what position would we be in?

Mr. President, there is no incident that would so inflame the minds of the American people as the holding up of a Red Cross vessel and the confiscation of articles on it contributed through the generosity of the American people for the help of the needy. That is the reason why I in the committee refused to support the joint resolution, and I cannot now support it on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. PITTMAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. McNARY. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] desired to be heard on the matter. For that reason I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Bilbo	Byrnes	Danaher
Andrews	Bone	Capper	Davis

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEE in the chair). Eighty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] has made a unanimous-consent request that Senate Joint Resolution 279 be considered at this time. Is there objection?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to be recognized for a moment to submit a question to the Senator from Nevada, which question did not arise this morning in the committee. However, it seems to me to bear definitely on the point.

I assume that we still would prefer not to send any American ships with anything—even with Red Cross supplies—into any portion of the maritime world which might be dangerous. Therefore, if ample tonnage is still available under other flags, and particularly under the British flag and the French flag, to carry Red Cross supplies going to those countries, why should not the same rule apply in respect to Red Cross supplies as applies to other commodities?

Then we come to the question of whether or not shipping facilities are available. Upon that question I wish to quote from a letter which Representative GEORGE BATES, of Massachusetts, has received from the Maritime Commission. The Commission quotes an important publication in New York as follows, under date of May 29:

> Shipping authorities of Great Britain and France, at the outset of the European war confronted with the problem of acquiring additional merchant vessels to transport war materials now have an abundance of tonnage available. The present situation reflects sharp contrast to the frenzied scramble made by the Allies for American and other neutral tonnage at premium prices up to a couple of months ago.

Our Maritime Commission says:

> It would appear from the above that the Allies have sufficient merchant tonnage to move whatever war supplies, foodstuffs, and other essential materials they may require from the United States.

I submit this question to the Senator: If it be true that Great Britain and France now have sufficient merchant tonnage to move whatever is required, why should we break down in any respect the particular injunction against the use of American ships which we wrote into the neutrality law last fall?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I do not see very much change in the situation from what we anticipated when we drafted the provision with regard to the Red Cross. I voted for the exception with regard to the Red Cross vessels because for many years, indeed from time immemorial, Red Cross vessels have had a unique status in the marine world. Throughout all history in war, Red Cross vessels have been held sacred by all the warring powers. Red Cross vessels were held sacred during the World War. That is the last experience we have had.

This war has been very short. As I recollect, not a single Red Cross ship was sunk during the World War; and they were going to all ports at that time. Unless the Senator has in mind that different conditions of war apply to Red Cross vessels than apply to ordinary merchantmen, then, of course, the argument of the Senator applies to any vessel.

So far as I am personally concerned, if foreign vessels could be obtained to carry the goods under the terms and conditions that they must be moved by the Red Cross, and that the vessels must be chartered to the Red Cross and be under the direct control of the Red Cross, it would be preferable, of course. So far as I am concerned I should urge the Red Cross to follow that practice. But it never has been done before.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The point is simply this: Last fall Congress said in its wisdom that even a Red Cross ship should not enter certain waters without a safe conduct from the belligerent countries involved. Now we are proposing to say that Red Cross ships shall go without a safe conduct because a safe conduct cannot be obtained. Therefore they must go at greater risk than they would have gone under the condition precedent.

Mr. PITTMAN. We do not say they must go. We say that if the President of the United States considers it safe to go in any part of the zone he may permit it. That is now the law.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I confess great sympathy with the viewpoint of the able Senator from Iowa; and so far as I am concerned I very reluctantly consented in the committee to this action, because it seems to me that when we demand a safe conduct and fail to get it, and then propose to proceed without one, obviously we are multiplying the hazards. I do not think we should multiply any hazards at this time. I think we confront about all the hazards we can assimilate. Yet we all, of course, want to sustain this great humanitarian work, and to do anything we can for the sufferers in the war areas. But if it is possible to ship the supplies under foreign signal flags—and the statement I have read from the Maritime Commission would indicate that it still can be done under foreign signal flags—it seems to me it would be preferable to leave the law as it is, and let the Red Cross work proceed under our auspices in ships which carry foreign signal flags.

Mr. PITTMAN. From the evidence received this morning, it is impossible to comply with the provision requiring safe conduct by all belligerent nations, and, therefore, we might just as well stop. We are trying to see if we can go on with Red Cross relief without that restriction, because the restriction makes it impossible.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I will yield in a moment. It might be better to have foreign vessels become American Red Cross vessels. They have got to be designated, whether they are foreign or not, as American Red Cross vessels, and they have got to have some American Red Cross personnel on board in charge of them. Of course, if a foreign ship in the service of the Red Cross were sunk there would not be as many American citizens lost; perhaps one or two Americans would lose their lives, but there would be the same cry probably against the sinking of a vessel killing but three or four Red Cross officers as if a dozen of them were killed.

However, the main proposition is this: The Congress in special session in 1939 decided practically unanimously, I think, that the President of the United States should have the power to designate combat areas, knowing that the designation of such combat areas would be a greater protection than the simple prohibition of American vessels going to belligerent ports, because American ships which were sunk in 1917 were sunk away out at sea, and some of them were not going to belligerent ports. The provision as to combat areas was the strongest protection in the act, and yet we had to leave it to the discretion of the President to fix the combat areas. Many said he never would fix them but the first thing he did was to fix them.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. Let me conclude the explanation. The President took in the whole of Europe, though he did not have to. Not only that, but in the Neutrality Act we had to grant him the discretion to determine when it was to the interest of this Government to make an exception to the combat-area provision. He has made only one exception so far, and that was to permit American relief ships to go into combat zones to bring home our citizens. That is the only exception. Section 3 of the law grants the President absolute power over American Red Cross vessels. He can prohibit any one of them from going anywhere near Europe, as he can prevent all our other ships from going there. We have had to trust that discretion to him because it is something that cannot be handled without a discretion; he can stop any one of these Red Cross ships any minute he wants to, and I have no doubt he will stop them if there is danger of their being sunk.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to ask the Senator if, in the hearings on this measure, there was any testimony to show whether or not, in the event the Red Cross ships of our own country were not permitted to go abroad, the Red Cross service could still be performed by other ships flying other flags than that of our own country?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; there was no testimony on that subject at all.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I was going to say that my recollection of the testimony is that Mr. Davis stated that Red Cross supplies were now going abroad in vessels of foreign flags. He mentioned the fact that on ships carrying armament and caissons Red Cross supplies should be well packed in between the other cargo.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is true. I thought the Senator from Maryland meant if he were chartering any foreign vessels for use as Red Cross vessels.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is right. I meant to ask, assuming that it would not be possible to get safe conduct for American ships carrying Red Cross supplies, whether or not there was before the committee any evidence which would show that Red Cross service could yet be carried on in other ships not flying the American flag, so that there would be no interruption of the service?

Mr. PITTMAN. Undoubtedly. As the Senator from Wisconsin says, it was stated that Red Cross relief material is being shipped on many vessels to countries in Europe as fast as the vessels are able to take them.

Mr. TYDINGS. I take it for granted, from the debate here on the floor, that the only reason American ships are being used is that at the time this particular cargo went over there were no other available ships. Is that correct?

Mr. PITTMAN. That was not testified to, but undoubtedly that is true. We know the fact to be that all vessels until recently were engaged in carrying Red Cross supplies.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think a great many of us who are not on the committee, and are not so familiar as are the chairman of the committee and other members of it, are wondering to what extent the shipment of Red Cross supplies will be curtailed if our own ships are prohibited from going into these zones. That is something that interests me, and I should like to have that evidence in deciding my own position on the matter.

Mr. PITTMAN. I could not say as to that.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. The testimony before the committee was that foreign-flag ships were being utilized to the fullest possible extent for carrying munitions and materials of war, as the chairman of the committee has indicated, and the only chance that the Red Cross had of getting any of these supplies on those vessels was to fill in the chinks, so to speak, and only in very nominal quantities, such as could be sandwiched in between the other cargo.

Mr. TYDINGS. In other words, the Senator's answer leaves me under the impression that the reason an American ship is going to Europe is that the other ships to which the Senator from Michigan adverted are not available for carrying Red Cross supplies; that it is impossible to get ships that will fly foreign flags to carry nothing but Red Cross cargo at this juncture when ships are in such demand for the Allies for other supplies?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not know, but it is perfectly evident that the Red Cross had to charter this American vessel to carry $500,000 worth of supplies to Europe. It is a whole shipload. It is being taken to one port for distribution in one section of the world. There is no doubt in my mind that the officers of the Red Cross are just as anxious as we are to keep their vessels from being sunk and lives lost; in fact, they are probably a little more humane than we are, as a general thing.

I believe the President of the United States has demonstrated by the way he designated the combat areas, and has kept all ships out of them, that he realizes the importance of preventing one of our vessels carrying American citizens being sunk; and I do not think he will be very lenient in the matter. I agree with the Senator from Michigan that foreign vessels can be chartered to carry these supplies in the future. The Red Cross, through caution, and the President, through caution, would require that it be done; but we are faced today with the fact that we have a limitation in the act which is impossible of performance. It is impossible to get a grant of safe conduct from five or six belligerent countries, especially as three of them cannot be found.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. Two of them have been found. As I understand from the statement made by the Senator from Iowa, two of the belligerents have been found, namely, Germany and Italy. These two belligerents have refused safe conduct, as I gather that from the statement made by the Senator from Iowa. That being so, this resolution seeks to set aside a provision of the neutrality law which we passed during the special session of Congress. It not that true?

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. McCARRAN. So, two belligerents having refused safe conduct for some reason or other—and they could both be found and were found—I should like to know why we should fly in the face of war?

Mr. PITTMAN. This amendment does not require us to "fly in the face of war," and we cannot fly anywhere so long as the provision to which I have referred is on the statute books. It will not be flying in the face of war when it is removed from the books so far as safe conduct is concerned. The intention to injure one and safe conduct are two different things. Germany, according to the testimony of Mr. Breckenridge Long, said this vessel would be all right going across the ocean until it got to Bordeaux; that they would not interfere with it. They said they would not interfere with it even at Bordeaux unless, they explained, they might perhaps be bombing Bordeaux at that time or the harbor might be mined. They do not object to this ship going there; they would not protect the ship; they simply said, "we will give it safe conduct; and it will have to take its own chances." That is what they told us. As a matter of fact, if the harbor was being bombed or the officers of the vessel were informed that the harbor was mined, they would be foolish to take the chance. I do not think anybody would be foolish enough to do it. On the other hand, with a complete conquest of France, and with Bordeaux in the possession of the Germans—I assume that is an event that will probably occur sometime soon—they would not continue bombing that port.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, a headline in the newspaper I picked up a few minutes ago indicates that the war is still going on, and that Great Britain is urging France to continue in the war; so Bordeaux may be in a condition of siege, or it may be bombed, at the very time this ship approaches the port.

Mr. PITTMAN. There is no doubt in the world that if that is going on, nobody will attempt to break in through that port. As a matter of fact, what those directing the ship want to do now is to have it go somewhere else. Here is a whole shipload of goods which has been contributed by the American people, a million dollars' worth, and we do not know where to take it. Finally we have billed it to a neutral port, Bilbao, Spain, and when we get it there we do not know what we can do with it there. We cannot take it to any other so-called belligerent port under this law. We shall have to bring it back. It will be a great deal better to find some port that is not blockaded, some place where there are suffering people, and run in there and dump the cargo. We do not want to bring it back here; but we shall have to bring it back here if we leave that provision in the act.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, let me say that the only reason why I inquired of my colleague, the able chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, is that there never was an hour, so far as I know, when this country was facing such an emergency—an emergency which was created, I am sorry to say, by some expressions which were uttered by the head of this Government not very long ago which aroused the hatred of foreign countries at war, a hatred which we should not have engendered. It is for that reason that everything possible may be done now to throw us over the precipice and into war. It was an unfortunate thing, an unhappy event. I think that is recognized throughout the length and breadth of America today. Be that as it may, it is an event of the past so far as we are concerned.

We have known, however—it has been disclosed to the Senate—that during the first World War ships went out of our ports under flags which should not have been flown at their mastheads. We know that the American flag was flown at the mastheads of vessels which should not have carried that flag.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator also recalls that when representations were made to certain belligerents, they denied the right of the United States to prevent them from using the American flag whenever their operations happened to make it desirable for them to do so.

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator's statement is entirely correct. Speaking individually, there is only one thing in which I am interested, and that is to keep America out of this war. I would sacrifice anything on earth to save the sons of American mothers from being slaughtered in a war we had nothing to do with initiating. We have no business over there.

I know that Great Britain is in the throes of her greatest emergency. I sympathize with her; but I do not sympathize with her enough to forget that she declared the war, and that we had nothing to do with it. I do not sympathize with any nation that declared the war enough to say, now that they have lost, that American blood should go abroad. I know that what would be most likely to bring us into this war would be the sinking of a Red Cross ship with an American flag flying at its masthead. Let one ship with the American flag at its masthead and the Red Cross on the side be sunk and every red-blooded American would rush into this holocaust of hell. We have no place there. That was done in 1917. Let it not be done today under the guise of an emergency.

For nearly a month we debated the question whether we would relinquish or relax our neutrality law. We did relax it, but provided that even Red Cross vessels should not enter combat zones. No exception was made for a Red Cross vessel. Today we know that the zone proposed to be entered by ship referred to is, by Presidential order, made a combat zone; and yet, in the face of our own law, created by a special session of Congress, we now propose to permit that ship to go in when two belligerent countries say they will not afford it safe conduct.

Mr. President, there is not a thing in the make-up of any Senator, certainly not in my make-up, that would deny human succor or relief to those who suffer; and I care not on what field they may fall. Fields matter nothing to me now. There is only one field for me, and that is the field which is covered by the Stars and Stripes. That is the field of the Western Hemisphere. I would as soon send succor and relief to the dying and the wounded Germans as I would send succor and relief to the dying and the wounded Britishers. They are all in an unhappy situation.

That, however, is not the question here involved. The question involved is, Shall we bring about, by this joint resolution, a violation of our own law passed by a special session of Congress? If we do, and by any chance the vessel goes down, then will the Congress of the United States be responsible?

I think it will be responsible. For that reason I do not propose to support the joint resolution, and I hope the joint resolution will not be pressed at this time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I do not intend to object to the consideration of the joint resolution at this time. I hope no objection may be made, and that the joint resolution may be considered upon its merits.

I entered upon the consideration of the joint resolution this morning in the Committee on Foreign Relations—and I had never seen the joint resolution in print until I arrived at the Committee on Foreign Relations—with very great misgiving and trepidation, which to some extent I still retain, although I think the joint resolution has been very much improved in the Foreign Relations Committee.

I regard with great trepidation any change in the neutrality status of the United States at this time of great international crisis. I particularly regarded with great misgiving these suggestions because one of the columnists closest to the administration, even the biographer of the President of the United States, no less a personage than he who was selected to be the hatchet man of the Postmaster General of the United States, last week in his column in the Washington Post of Wednesday, June 12, projected two methods by which the United States might be involved in the war. One was the convoy of vessels through the war zone by American warships. The other was—and I quote:

> A second alternative might be to send food, clothing, and other nonmilitary necessities in unconvoyed ships bearing the insignia of the Red Cross, with a warning that the torpedoing or bombing of any of them would bring us into the war as an acknowledged belligerent.

Therefore, Mr. President, as I say, it was with great misgiving that I entered upon the consideration of this joint resolution in the Foreign Relations Committee this morning.

The first of the alternatives suggested—that is, the idea of convoying ships through the danger zone by American war vessels—has been negatived by the adoption by the committee of the amendment I offered in the committee this morning. The other danger I discussed in the committee this morning, and the committee discussed it at length, and I desire to discuss it again in a moment. Let me say that another ground upon which this joint resolution may have been justly regarded with misgiving is the fact that it employs the device of general legislation to take care of a particular situation.

In other words, on the plea that the ship, the City of McKeesport, is already at sea, that safe conduct has been denied it in the port of Bordeaux, that to send it to the port of Bilbao, Spain, is inconvenient, may necessitate either a very difficult trucking operation into France, or a transfer of the cargo into smaller vessels at Bilbao for transport to Bordeaux, general legislation is to be enacted.

So far as I am concerned, I have no particular fear with regard to allowing the City of McKeesport to enter the port of Bordeaux. I do not believe that either the German nation or the Italian nation will interfere with that ship, that is, to the extent of sinking it or torpedoing it. But, under the plea that it is necessary to provide for a particular ship, we are asked to enact general legislation, which might come back to plague us.

Mr. President, I saw that done once in the not too distant past. I saw the State Department rush up proposed legislation designed to stop the sailing of a particular ship loaded with arms for the legitimate government, as it then was, of Spain, to keep one particular ship from sailing from the port of San Francisco, and under that presentation we passed general legislation with regard to the export of arms to the belligerents in Spain, which conceivably may have decided the result of the civil war in Spain, and also conceivably may have been a determinative factor in the world war which afterward ensued. Therefore, I regard it as bad practice to enact general legislation of very far reaching effect with regard to a particular situation.

Mr. President, that brings me to the probable effect of the joint resolution. Let me say that I finally voted to report it from the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I intend to vote for it in the Senate, in view of the assurances which were given to the committee, and which I am sure the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations will state and renew to the Senate at this time on behalf of the State Department and of the Red Cross.

The other suggestion which gave me very great misgiving was the fact that in line 12 of the joint resolution appears the word "food." Let me read the whole amended provision, which is very brief:

> Section 4. The provisions of section 2 (a)—
>
> Which refers to the Neutrality Act—
> shall not prohibit the transportation by vessels under charter or other direction and control—

And after the word "vessels" there was inserted an amendment on my motion in these words "by vessels unarmed and not under convoy"—

> The provisions of section 2 (a) shall not prohibit the transportation by vessels, unarmed and not under convoy, under charter or other direction and control of the American Red Cross of officers and American Red Cross personnel, medical personnel, and medical supplies, food, and clothing, for the relief of human suffering.

Mr. President, so far as the cargo of the City of McKeesport is concerned, it contains food, it contains a good deal of food, and, of course, food is contraband of war. But we are assured by the head of the American Red Cross, and the Assistant Secretary of State, representing the State Department, that the food which is contained in the present cargo of the City of McKeesport is in the nature of medical supplies. There is food, to be sure. It is largely in the form of condensed milk and food necessary for hospital supplies, although some of it may be used for feeding refugees. So far as that particular cargo is concerned, I do not believe the Germans, or the Italians, or any other belligerent, even as much as international public opinion has been defied hitherto, would dare to defy international public opinion by objecting to it.

It was testified this morning that during the World War hospital supplies in the nature of food of a similar character were passed through the British blockade by the permission of the British Government, and I believe that a similar thing might be done now. But the joint resolution as it stands seemed to me this morning to be susceptible of an interpretation calculated to carry out the first suggestion of the eminent columnist, the confidant of the administration. In other words, assuming a situation which we all regret and deplore, but which might readily exist—and I have the authority of no less a person than Sir Neville Henderson, and other eminent authorities on the subject—assuming such a situation that the British Isles might be beleaguered by a counterblockade, that Germany, taking advantage of its naval and air bases on the English Channel, and in Norway, might set up a counterblockade against the British Isles. We all know the great weapon of Great Britain and of the Allies in the last war, and of the United States after we got into the war, was to starve Germany into submission. We all know that that has been the strategy of the Allies in this war. It may be that, instead of attacking the British Isles, Germany may elect to establish a counterblockade of submarines and airplanes, and engage in a counterattempt to starve Great Britain and the British Isles.

I wished to be assured, in the consideration of this matter in the committee this morning, that the word "food" in the joint resolution would not be taken as an authority to the American Red Cross to load down ships with food supplies for a belligerent, and attempt to run a blockade, with the certainty that the other belligerent, from a military standpoint, was bound to try to prevent the food from reaching their enemy, and with the certainty that the sinking of the American Red Cross ship would bring the United States into the war.

That matter was fully discussed in the Committee on Foreign Relations this morning. Mr. Breckenridge Long, Assistant Secretary of State, representing the State Department officially, and Mr. Norman Davis, the head of the American Red Cross, stated categorically and repeatedly that the authority contained in the joint resolution would not under any circumstances be taken as authority to run a blockade by Red Cross ships bearing food to any belligerent.

I should be glad to have the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations state on the floor of the Senate at this time whether or not my recollection of that is correct.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator's statement is correct, but our memories can always be refreshed by reference to the report of the hearings, which were taken down in shorthand and will be transcribed. My memory is perfectly clear upon those questions and answers, and I think that what the Senator says is absolutely accurate.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It was only with that very definite understanding and assurance that I voted to report the joint resolution from the Committee on Foreign Relations this morning, and I did so with full knowledge that the assurance of any representative of any department, or of any representative of such an organization as the Red Cross, no matter how highly placed, was a weak instrument upon which to depend in the face of a grant of power by law. But, in view of the utmost necessity of this matter, in view of the many-times-expressed desire of the American people to render whatever aid may be rendered for the alleviation of human suffering, I voted for the joint resolution in the Committee on Foreign Relations this morning, and I intend to vote for it in the Senate. But I think it should be voted on with the most explicit understanding that it is not to be taken as an authorization for using Red Cross ships to run blockades to supply food to belligerents. If I knew how to draw an amendment precisely to take care of that situation, I would not vote for the joint resolution without such an amendment in it.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Nevada whether he can advise us of a number of items which Great Britain, Germany, and France have put on their contraband lists.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am sorry I cannot. I know the lists have been added to from time to time.

Mr. BONE. During the last war our vessels were repeatedly seized by Great Britain, because of her control of the seas, for attempting to send what she considered to be contraband into neutral ports, with the idea that the cargoes would be transshipped to German ports, and, on the theory of continuous voyage, they were seized.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to what the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has had to say about an understanding the State Department might have had with the committee. But suppose one of these ships, Germany or Italy not agreeing to its passage, should be seized or sunk. Certainly we all know that any vague understanding an under officer of the State Department might have reached with the committee would not have any more influence than a scrap of paper. In fact, it would be utterly meaningless. We can discuss that here, but if one of these ships should be sunk on the theory that she was carrying contraband, that, I think all would agree, would be so highly provocative a thing that, in the present state of mind, it might be the match which would set off the fire.

It is very difficult to handle a measure such as this, because it is an appealing thing, but it is much more appealing to consider the effect it might have upon the lives of hundreds and thousands of our boys, and upon the life of the Republic, if the country, through an emotional outburst, should be catapulted into war by reason of the sinking of a Red Cross ship. I do not think there is anyone here who believes that our humanitarian impulses should not have full sway, but I agree with the Senator from Missouri that I should want to see no mishap in this venture become the basis for a declaration of war. It were better to preserve America than to try to help the hungry and injured over there, as high and as holy a purpose as that is.

Mr. President, I think we all ought to think about this now, because if anything happens we shall be called upon to do what the Senator from Nevada said a while ago—be red-blooded Americans and go out and fight someone. Right now is the time to decide whether or not we want to take that risk.

I have every sympathy with the purpose of the joint resolution, but I think that the Members of the United States Senate should make up their minds immeditely that if something shall happen to one vessel or two vessels, we will not send forth a great army of American boys to die on account of such an incident, but that we will have the courage to be Americans first, even though someone gets hurt in the doing of a worth-while thing. That would not, in my judgment, be any justification for a war. Those are things we must seriously consider, because later we could not undo what we might do now.

I am in thorough sympathy with the purpose of the joint resolution.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I may call the attention of the able Senator from Washington to the incident that probably catapulted us into the World War, namely the sinking of the Lusitania. It was broadcast at the time that the Lusitania was carrying contraband of war. It was denied very emphatically, but it was true, and American citizens were warned to stay off that vessel, because it was carrying contraband of war. It was denied at the time by Great Britain and by British authorities; it was denied by American authorities as well; but American authorities and British authorities later were compelled to admit the fact that that vessel was not only carrying mounted guns, or places for mounted guns, but was carrying contraband of war.

It was also questioned as to how the Lusitania was sunk. Let us suppose that tomorrow the vessel in question, en route to Bordeaux or entering the port of Bordeaux, is sunk, and the blame is laid on Germany or Italy, against both of which countries we have uttered very vitriolic expressions, and against whom the American people have been aroused to a feeling of hatred. Suppose the blame is laid against an innocent country and sentiment in the United States is aroused to such a point that it will flame into war against that country, will our people not blame the Congress of the United States, because it did not indulge in dispassionate consideration of this matter, after having spent nearly a month in consideration of letting down the bars of our neutrality law and carefully guarding against the very thing we now approach? Should we now in this moment, in the midst of the consideration of another piece of legislation, bring ourselves to such a point that even the mothers of America, realizing the value and work of the Red Cross in humanity's affairs, may be aroused to say, "Yes; we will go to war"?

Mr. President, let us avoid that moment. Let us take a little time. We have here a tax bill pending. The raising of money by taxes is part of national defense. We are trying to consider it carefully. Why in the midst of that consideration should we lay it aside to take up something that will nullify answers to a vital question that was considered here for nearly a month in special session?

I am only fearful that something may arise, I am only fearful that an emergency may ensue, I am only fearful that a match may be thrown into this inflammable material to arouse the country even more than it is now aroused. I am only fearful that we may declare war. Let us not do it. Let us pause here.

A few days delay will not hinder mature consideration, and mature consideration of this important matter will do no harm to this country, in an hour when it is about to be inflamed. Our human sympathies are being worked on day by day. Now, let something happen, and see the flames that will burst forth from America.

Mr. President, this hour is a momentous one in the world's history, because the headlines of this afternoon say that England has declared that France is not going to capitulate. I wonder where the assurance is coming from by which they could make such a statement. I am wondering if Great Britain has received some whispers from some other sources that other nations and other powers are coming into the hell of war in the creation of which we had no hand. If she has given such assurances, if any belligerent powers have given such assurances, they are simply making a mistake, unless they can arouse the American blood and the American people to a state of war by the sinking of a Red Cross vessel flying an American flag at its masthead, and I think that would in all probability lead us into war.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] another question. I have not been privileged to hear all the debate. The existing law, which was passed in the special session last year, provides in general that the American Red Cross may send vessels into war zones provided they proceed under safe conduct by the nations named in the President's proclamation.

Mr. PITTMAN. Not in war zones; in belligerent ports.

Mr. BONE. That is what I mean. The vessel would probably have to go through a war zone to reach a belligerent port.

Mr. PITTMAN. They have to get additional permission from the President with respect to that.

Mr. BONE. Now, I want to ask, for my own satisfaction, whether or not this joint resolution was introduced because belligerent nations had refused to grant that safe permit.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; it was.

Mr. BONE. What are we to assume as the result of that? That the belligerent powers, having denied an agreement for safe conduct, will resent our action, and, if so, how will that resentment be exhibited?

I am sorry I am not a member of the Foreign Relations Committee on an occasion of this kind—aside from that I would not care to be a member of the committee—but I should like to have heard that particular thought explored by representatives of the State Department.

If we now face the assurance that safe conduct has been denied, then we must proceed with this legislation with the certainty in the mind of every Senator that these vessels will have to run some kind of a gantlet. I have listened day after day to statements of Senators that Hitler has declared war on us. Well, it may be only a figure of speech, but a few weeks from now as the result of this sort of thing we all may be sitting here, the Senator from Nevada and myself, to vote on the question of declaration of war.

Mr. PITTMAN. The reason I just took my seat was that although the Senator rose to ask me a question, he continued, and I got tired and sat down.

Mr. BONE. Perhaps I am prolix, but I want to get this thing thoroughly in my mind as well as in the minds of other Senators. I am not as able to untangle this matter as are some of my brethren who are members of the Foreign Relations Committee, but obviously this joint resolution could only be introduced when it became apparent that Red Cross vessels were to be denied safe passage through war zones. Is there any escape from that conclusion?

Mr. PITTMAN. There is no doubt that the Senator is correct.

Mr. BONE. That is the point I wish to understand.

Mr. PITTMAN. However, the Senator must remember that the wording of the joint resolution requires all the belligerent nations named in the proclamation to join in the grant. Today that is physically impossible, because three of them which were named in the proclamation as being at war cannot be found.

Mr. BONE. That requirement merely assumes the aspect of a technicality. I am concerned now with whether or not Italy and Germany would agree. If the others are liquidated and no longer exist, obviously, as a matter of simple, ordinary law, they could not grant consent when they no longer exist. But the point is, Will Italy and Germany object? Obviously, our State Department, despite its assurances, must tell the Senate committee that there is no agreement by Germany and Italy. They are the belligerent powers which would do the damage. I must confront the fact that we must force the vessel through over their objections.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, it has been stated several times on this floor that both Mr. Breckenridge Long and Mr. Norman Davis testified that, with regard to relief, there is a very friendly attitude on the part of Germany both to Poland and France. The attitude has been very friendly. It has been cooperative. Germany simply stated the actual fact: "You will have no danger in going across the ocean. We are not antagonistic. But when you get into the port of Bordeaux, our airplanes may be bombing that port, and therefore we cannot say that you will be safe there."

Is not that a different thing from forcing the ship into a port?

Mr. BONE. Perhaps I used the wrong expression. However, I know that the belligerent powers have adopted one technique. The technique of starvation through blockade was emphasized in the World War. Great Britain put more than 200 items on her contraband list, and well toward the top was food. Without food a nation must perish. If Germany is 1 percent as vicious and bad as has been suggested by some able Senators, if she felt that she could in her own conscience justify preventing food from reaching France or England, she probably would do it. I say that because we have not challenged the statement that Hitler is sadistic and bad. We have heard such statements on this floor time and time again. That sort of fellow would not stop at anything.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BONE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. With regard to the argument of the Senator from Washington as to food in future emergencies, and the possibility of a blockade of the British Isles, I think his point is very well taken. But when he confuses that situation with the question of a particular ship which is now on its way to Europe, I think it is only fair to say that the undisputed testimony was that so far as Germany was concerned she raised no objection whatever to the make-up of the cargo of the City of McKeesport, even though it includes food. The whole point so far as the Germans were concerned is that they would not guarantee safe conduct in such a port as Bordeaux, which by the time the ship arrived there might conceivably present a scene similar to that at Dunkerque.

So far as the Italians were concerned, they did not object to the sailing of the ship, and they did not unconditionally refuse a safe conduct; but according to the testimony they did say that before they could grant safe conduct it would be necessary for the American Red Cross or the United States Government, whichever was responsible, to submit to them a detailed copy of the manifest. In that connection they have called attention to the fact that under the Italian law, soap, being a vegetable or animal fat, and also motor vehicles, were on the unconditional contraband list.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I content myself with one further statement, which is inspired by the statement of the Senator from Missouri. This is not special legislation, in the true sense. It is general legislation. Anything I have said respecting this particular matter is inspired by the fact that this is general legislation. If it is adopted, it will become a part of the neutrality legislation of the United States. The only fear I have had in my heart is not that something would happen to the vessel just mentioned by the Senator from Missouri, but that in furtherance of our desire to help the hungry, the wretched, the wounded, and the dying in Britain, Germany, or France by some improvident act, some terrible act which could affect only the vessel itself and its crew—however terrible that might be, it would affect only a comparatively few men—we might be forced to see grow up in this country overnight, a flaming desire to thrust, not a few men, but a whole nation, into war. As a result we should be compelled immediately to adopt the program suggested last night by the able Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER]—that is, totalitarianism for the United States. We have to consider those things because they are implicit in the whole picture.

I listen almost every night to the short-wave radio broadcasts from European countries. They are no longer coming from France. Time and time again I have heard the French radio station Paris Mondial announce through commentators that the Germans had deliberately and willfully bombed Red Cross units. The English broadcasting station has repeated such statements. I think every Senator has read them in the press of America.

If Red Cross units have been bombed so frequently that Americans in Paris, talking over the Paris Mondial radio station, say to the people of America in a special broadcast for North America that the Red Cross sign was painted out so that it would not be a particularly luminous and shining target for German bombers, it is obvious that a Red Cross sign somewhere else will not protect a ship any more than it will protect an ambulance unit in or near the battlefield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] has requested unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 279. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLT. Yes; there is objection, Mr. President; but I desire to speak before I make the objection.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLT. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. If there is to be prolonged discussion, I think the regular order should be called for. I thought it would be possible to pass the joint resolution quickly. It is important that we get the tax bill out of the way this afternoon; and if there is to be prolonged discussion I shall have to call for the regular order.

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I desire to speak for perhaps 5 minutes, and then I shall yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia reserves the right to object.

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I cannot sit silently in my seat on a matter like this. My heart goes out to the wounded and dying of Europe just as much as does the proponents of the joint resolution. But we know that certain officials of our country are ready for some incident to ignite the flame of war; and nothing would start that flame more quickly than the destruction of a Red Cross vessel.

I know, and we all know, what effect the sinking of vessels carrying contraband of war had in the last war. If this vessel is sunk, innocently or deliberately, sentiment on the part of some is ready to declare war—frankly, sentiment on the part of some high officials of this country who have charge of determining the destination of the vessels.

I am not willing to sit in my seat and allow that incident to be created. When the newspapers and radio commentators say that the President of the United States is discussing with persons at the White House the question of whether or not he can have a declaration of war, I will not vote to put into his hands without question the possibility of creating an incident which could drive my country into war and kill my people.

I realize that it may not be wise politically to say what I am saying, but I believe it. I say, Mr. President, that as long as I have a voice in this body I shall raise it against any chance of provoking an incident by which we can be drawn into the war. I want to provide Red Cross supplies to all those affected by the war, but I am not willing to do it at the expense of perhaps in the future providing Red Cross supplies for our own sons. The possibility exists. Let us help. We can do so without providing this danger.

During the neutrality debate it was stated that if we did not pass the measure in a hurry, and one ship of the United States were sunk going across the ocean, we might get into the war. That was before the propaganda had been in effect in this country to generate a war hysteria. Every Member of this body knows that war hysteria exists, ready for an explosion. The possibility is there, and nothing would bring about an explosion more quickly than the sinking of a Red Cross vessel.

As the Senator from Washington said, the newspapers have carried the statement that the Red Cross emblem was taken off certain ambulances in order that they might not be targets for the Germans. I do not know whether or not the press release is true; but let us not take the chance. We cannot afford to take the chance that our boys would have to be killed as the result. That is what we will be doing. In the name of charity and humanity we are deliberately taking a chance which may mean that we shall need charity and humanity at home for our own soldiers.

If this vessel is sunk, how should we know which country sank it? Do we know today who sank the Athenia? We have heard all kinds of stories as to who sank the Athenia. If this particular vessel carrying Red Cross supplies should be sunk, and if the proper kind of propaganda should lay the sinking at the door of Germany, immediately there would break out the flames of hatred which have been generated by men high in this administration and generated on the floor of the United States Senate by warmongering speeches.

Yes, there is the possibility. If some men want to go to war, in view of no incidents against us, how on earth would they react if a vessel of the United States with the Red Cross emblem on it were sunk? Some want to go to war today. We read in the newspapers statements of individuals asking that we declare war, yes, by some individuals who might profit by it, by some hysterical meddlers, but none who would serve in the armed forces. They would have us go to war, but if we sent this ship across the ocean and it was sunk there would not be only 30 men signing a petition for us to go to war, but there might be many, many times 30.

Why take the chance? It has been shown here this afternoon that there is a very definite chance that the vessel might encounter trouble. Belligerents have refused to guarantee safe passage. It is said it might go to the port of Bordeaux, where the fighting might be in progress at the time it was landing or after it was in port unloading. The necessity of bringing this resolution shows that those in control felt there was danger, yes, great danger, that the ship might run into trouble.

Why take the chance? Why create a possibility of the war hysteria getting any more persons to emotionally lose their good judgment and ask for war?

In our generosity—and we should have that as we have had—we provide these supplies, why would it be asking too much that the countries in this conflict transport them in the danger zones. I wish we could do so without danger, but we cannot.

Why should we not consider the interest of the boys of America who will need such supplies if we involve ourselves in war instead of the interest of the unfortunate boys of Europe? Today this little innocent resolution might be the spark that would send thousands of American boys to their death.

So long as I have breath in my body I shall raise my voice to object to creating incidents when some in this country are ready for somebody to set off the dynamite in order to cover up the failures of the past.

I wish to say to the Senate that I do not object, of course, to charity, but I object, in the name of the boys of America, to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also announced that on June 17, 1940, the President had approved and signed the following bills and joint resolution:

S. 3578. An act for the relief of Edward Smith;

S. 3683. An act to extend the time limit for cooperation between the Bureau of Reclamation and the Farm Security Administration in the development of farm units on public lands under Federal reclamation projects; and

S. J. Res. 59. Joint resolution authorizing the Bureau of Labor Statistics to collect information as to amount and value of all goods produced in State and Federal prisons.

[NOTE: S. 3530. An act to prohibit the exportation of tobacco seed and plants, except for experimental purposes; presented to (and received by) the President on May 23, 1940.—The foregoing bill having been presented to the President of the United States for his approval, and not having been returned by him to the House of Congress in which it originated within 10 days (Sundays excepted), the time prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, has become a law without Presidential approval.]

REVENUE BILL OF 1940

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10039) to provide for the expenses of national preparedness by raising revenue and issuing bonds, to provide a method for paying for such bonds, and for other purposes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Virginia if he has concluded his discussion of his amendment?

Mr. BYRD. I have concluded for the time being.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield the floor?

Mr. BYRD. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, during the presentation made by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] of the pending amendment, I suggested that there ought to be a limitation on the amount of reduction which could be made in respect of any appropriation. I have prepared such an amendment, which I send to the desk, and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana to the committee amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment on page 33, line 7, after the word "affected", it is proposed to insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That in no case shall any appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, be reduced more than 25 percent.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, as the committee amendment now reads there is vested in the President of the United States, in effect, the power to veto any item of any appropriation bill not contained within the exception. I think the purpose of the Senator from Virginia can be served by not vesting so broad an authority and direction in the President of the United States.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Virginia a question?

Mr. OVERTON. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator from Virginia feel that he could accept this amendment?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana simply prevents a reduction greater than 25 percent in the case of any single appropriation. It would not affect the total savings under the bill, and I am inclined to accept it.

Mr. OVERTON. I thank the Senator from Virginia for accepting the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ELLENDER in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana to the committee amendment.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. OVERTON. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I desire to ask a question, through the Senator from Louisiana, of the author of the amendment. I am very much concerned as to two propositions: One is the reduction of salaries of Federal employees. Does the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana, and accepted by the Senator from Virginia, at all propose to reduce by 25 precent or 10 percent, or any other percentage whatever, the salaries or income of Federal employees?

Mr. BYRD. I will say to the Senator from Nevada that the same restriction is provided, namely, that salaries which are set forth by law are regarded as fixed charges and this amendment will in no way affect them.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Louisiana will kindly yield again——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. OVERTON. I will be glad to yield in a moment, but I should like first to state that the amendment I have offered does not change at all the general text of the amendment as submitted by the committee. The amendment which I propose is simply a limitation upon the authority vested in the President, and that limitation is——

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask a question there?

Mr. OVERTON. Let me finish the sentence. That limitation is that the President may not reduce any appropriation beyond 25 percent. It does not change the classifications at all; it does not change the exceptions; it does not relate to salaries, and it does not relate to fixed charges. It is simply a proviso added to the committee amendment.

Now I am glad to yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Conceding what the Senator has said, I am wondering whether the two provisions are not somewhat inconsistent? The 10-percent provision is mandatory; the President is not only authorized but is directed to make such curtailment in the appropriations which are subject to curtailment as to bring about a minimum 10-percent reduction. I am sympathetic with what the Senator from Louisiana is trying to do, but it is entirely conceivable that the President may not find it possible to reduce some departments at all, not even 10 percent or 1 percent. That would mean that in order to carry out the mandatory provisions of reducing to an aggregate of 10 percent he would have to reduce others more than 10 percent, more than 20 percent, and even as much as 50 percent. If we are going to compel the President to reduce in the aggregate 10 percent, are we entirely consistent when we say that he cannot reduce any department more than 25 percent; and if he cannot reduce any department more than 25 percent, can he carry out the mandatory provision that he has got to reduce all of them enough to make a minimum of 10 percent?

Mr. OVERTON. I think it is a question of policy.

Mr. BARKLEY. I grant it is a question of policy; but we are undertaking to compel him to do something in one breath and in the next we are making it probably impossible for him to do what we are compelling him to do.

Mr. OVERTON. The point I make is that we should not compel the President, in carrying out this amendment, to wipe out entirely certain appropriations. Take, for instance, the appropriations referred to by the Senator from Georgia—the appropriations in reference to payments to the farmers.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am wondering whether or not there ought not to be some relaxation in the mandatory provision of the amendment. I realize that the President can reduce, without any request or any authorization or without any command, but here we undertake to compel him to reduce a total of 10 percent. It is utterly impossible for him to reduce all the departments 10 percent. Some of them he cannot touch. It may be that there are so many of them he cannot touch that he cannot bring about the 10-percent reduction in the aggregate without going above 25 percent in other departments or other appropriations.

Mr. OVERTON. I may say, in reply to the Senator from Kentucky, that I think—of course, my opinion may not be worth very much in that connection——

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator's opinion is always worth a great deal to me and to the Senate.

Mr. OVERTON. I thank the Senator. I will throw out the suggestion to the Senator from Kentucky, and then if he approves it I shall know my view is worth a great deal. There is sufficient latitude. The President can make a reduction up to 25 percent in any appropriation. Some, I concede, he will not reduce at all, and it would be proper for him not to make any reduction as to them; but the average is to be 10 percent; and when we give the President the leeway, a margin of 15 percent over and above the 10 percent, it seems to me we give him sufficient margin to make it practicable.

Mr. BARKLEY. Suppose the President makes a survey of the various appropriations and decides that many of them cannot be touched, and, laying them aside, he begins to consider those he can cut and finds by cutting all of them 25 percent he cannot yet bring about a 10-percent reduction in the total—what would he do?

Mr. OVERTON. My answer to that is that the amendment itself ought to be rejected if that cannot be done. I think the idea of making some particular items of appropriation bear the whole burden of reduction is fundamentally wrong; and if we cannot get a workable amendment which will place some restriction on this drastic operation, involving vetoing items of appropriation, then we ought not to adopt the amendment at all. I am in sympathy with the amendment; I expect to vote for the amendment; but I think there ought to be some curtailment of the authority vested in the President in respect to reducing appropriations.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I desire to say a word in conclusion, and then I shall not take any more of the Senator's time. I am in sympathy with the objective sought to be accomplished by the amendment. I am still somewhat disturbed about the mandatory requirement. We may be requiring the President to do something he cannot do; and if he cannot do it, where will he be under the mandatory provision of the amendment now under consideration?

Mr. OVERTON. I may say to the Senator from Kentucky that that objection could be easily overcome by offering another amendment which would not affect the one I am offering.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; it could be overcome, provided the Senate would adopt that sort of an amendment.

Mr. OVERTON. If this amendment is adopted, another one may be offered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERTON. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think the Senator, in his response to the Senator from Kentucky, has given the answer to the question I wished to propound; but it seems to me we may be creating such a situation that the President would not be in a position to know which one of the mandatory provisions of this amendment he should violate. If we direct him to cut 10 percent, and then say he shall not cut more than 25 percent from any one appropriation, it seems to me we are creating a situation which may make it impossible for him to carry out the provisions of the amendment.

In saying that, I may say to the Senator that I am not unsympathetic with the purpose he has in mind, because I am pretty sure in my own mind that I know where this ax is going to fall hardest. It is going to fall hardest on the Government employees, the appropriations for agriculture, and the appropriations for relief, because that is where the big savings are going to have to be made if a reduction of 10 percent is made.

Mr. OVERTON. Senators may differ as to where the ax will fall. I entertain certain views which do not exactly correspond with those just expressed by the Senator from Wisconsin; but the objection he raises, and the objection the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] raises, can be easily cured by an amendment which either one of them may offer, and that is to strike out, in lines 1 and 2, the words "and directed," which would leave the President authorized to take this action. but not directed to do so.

I am not offering that amendment. I am in favor of the mandatory provision. I am in favor of the amendment as it is, but I think it can be made to work with this ceiling of 25 percent.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. OVERTON. Yes.

Mr. BONE. The Constitution provides that when a bill passes both Houses of Congress it shall go to the President, and if he signs it, it becomes a law. By this rather indirect operation we permit the President subsequently to veto part of the law, a thing which the Constitution does not permit.

I am wondering if someone might not subsequently raise that question and precipitate this issue into the lap of the courts, because obviously what is sought here, I think in the first instance, ought to be done by Congress. We ought to do the pruning and the cutting of the Budget, instead of passing the Budget, having it become a law, and then dumping it on the lap of the President and having him do what the Constitution says he cannot do.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator from Washington that the appropriations bills are already passed. The only way to reduce them now is either to recall them and send them back to the Appropriations Committee, or to adopt a provision such as this. Of course, this provision is warranted only by the crisis which confronts the country and the necessity for making tremendous expenditures for armament.

Mr. BONE. I am making no point of it on the merits of the matter. I am simply pointing out that we are short-circuiting the constitutional provision about how a law is created, and how the President may veto it. He is vetoing it piecemeal in this way.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. OVERTON. I am very glad to yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. I think the amendment of the Senator from Virginia is difficult to sustain where it attempts to give to the President power to reduce an appropriation. An appropriation is a legislative act. In other words, it is a law. I think what can be done is to leave the appropriation, and to put in a provision which restricts the President in spending it, or gives him power to spend less than the appropriation.

If we appropriate $100,000,000, we may put in a provision that of the $100,000,000 appropriated the President may spend only 90 percent. By so doing we put the restriction upon the official who is responsible to the Congress, and we do not give to him the power to amend the law.

In other words, the amendment as it is written seeks to give the President power actually to amend the law by changing the appropriation, rather than requiring him to make a reduction in the expenditure authorized under the law.

May I add a further word with reference to the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]? I do not read the law as he does. I should like to be straightened out. I did not understand that it was the intent of this amendment that there should be a gross 10-percent reduction, and that the 10 percent should be worked out by distribution. I thought there was to be a compulsory reduction of at least 10 percent in every item of expenditure coming within the amendment, and that in some items, under the Senator's amendment, the President could go beyond the 10 percent and go up to 25 percent. In other words, it was my understanding that in the case of any item coming within the purview of this amendment there must be a 10-percent reduction, so that we would not meet the problem that there would not be a gross reduction even if that were required.

Mr. OVERTON. I think the Senator is in error in his interpretation of the amendment. Under the amendment as it now stands the President may not make any reduction at all in one appropriation, and he may make a 100-percent reduction in another appropriation. He has full authority in that respect, and that is discretionary authority. All that is mandatory is that when he has completed the job there shall be a net result of 10-percent reduction in the total nondefense appropriations.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, much has been said about the devastating effect of this amendment upon the relief appropriations and its derogatory consequences resulting in the impairment of agricultural items.

To make a point for elasticity, and to recall the workings of a department with which I am familiar, to show the manner in which difficult, definite, restrictive, iron-clad limitations would work, I desire to make just a few observations, for the benefit of the Senator whose amendment is now being considered, as to how it would affect the Post Office Department.

This is a department which earns its way. Its revenues are based upon its services; and if we withdraw the services, we cut down the revenue.

For instance, we appropriate $816,000,000, of which $610,000,000 goes for salaries and $175,000,000 for fixed charges, contracts to the railroads, steamship companies, and other contractors which will not consider a reduction. Therefore, there remains only $31,000,000 with which to effect a saving of $81,000,000 unless we take it out of the employees. If we reduce the salaries of employees, we eliminate postal services. If we eliminate postal services, if we furlough postal workers, we reduce the postal revenues, and we are no better off at the end of the proceedings than we were in the beginning.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, my amendment does not affect that situation, except that it places a limit of 25 percent on the reduction that may be made.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I think the Senator from New York has confused the first amendment I offered with the amendment now pending. The first amendment did provide a horizontal cut of 10 percent in all appropriations. The pending amendment provides that there shall be an over-all cut of nondefense appropriations to the extent of 10 percent of such appropriations. It does not mean that each department is to be reduced. It is left discretionary with the President as to what appropriations he will reduce. I repeat—the Senator probably was not here earlier in the day when the statement was first made—that the Budget Bureau has given an opinion that all salaries fixed by law, which include the salaries of the postal employees, are not subject to reduction under this amendment.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. MEAD. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I hope the Senator will correct me, but I have listened privately and publicly to the Senator, and I am not able to gather from his explanation that the Bureau of the Budget have made such a statement. In other words, they declare what are fixed charges, but in those fixed charges they do not include salaries; at least, I have not seen that statement.

Mr. BYRD. The Under Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Bell, the Budget Director, Mr. Smith, and Mr. Lawton of the Budget Bureau, met with the chairman of the Finance Committee, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], and myself, and said that any salaries fixed by law they would regard as fixed charges not subject to reduction under this amendment. That statement may be confirmed by a telephone conversation with any of these gentlemen.

Mr. McCARRAN. The able Senator from Virginia has in his hand a statement which he read earlier in the day in which he made special mention of the items that were regarded as fixed charges. Has he any other statement, in which salaries are treated as fixed charges, which might go into the RECORD?

Mr. BYRD. The statement I read was merely a memorandum, which is unsigned, and which was furnished by the Bureau of the Budget to the chairman of the Finance Committee and myself, giving these items. But in conference with these gentlemen it was stated that if a salary were fixed by law, the amendment would not give the power to change the salary. That has been confirmed by the legislative counsel, with whom I have consulted. If the Senator from Nevada has any doubt about the matter, I suggest that he call the head of the Bureau of the Budget, who can tell him exactly the ruling he made at the conference with the chairman of the Finance Committee and myself.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from New York will yield, the Senator from Virginia will admit that this amendment provides for or gives opportunity for complete furloughs in any department.

Mr. BYRD. I would not say complete furloughs, because that would prevent a department from operating. It can provide for some furloughs, and it is further intended not to have the vacancies which will occur filled, which would result in a very substantial saving. But I want it distinctly understood—and the chairman of the Committee on Finance will sustain me—that the Budget Director and the Under Secretary of the Treasury advised us that under the amendment salaries would be regarded as fixed charges, and would not be subject to reduction, because they are fixed by law.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield in order that I may ask the Senator from Louisiana a question?

Mr. MEAD. I am glad to yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not have a copy of the Senator's amendment, but I should like to ask the Senator how he defines the word "appropriations" as it is contained in his amendment? Does it refer to the total appropriations contained in an appropriation bill; does it refer to the specific items in the bill, or does it refer to the particular headings in an appropriation act?

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, the language of the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana conforms with the language contained in the committee amendment. The committee amendment authorizes and directs the President to reduce appropriations. That is the language used. My proposed amendment to the amendment reads, "Provided, That in no case shall any appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, be reduced more than 25 percent." I understand that by "appropriation," any item of appropriation is meant.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator from New York will yield, I should like to point out to the able Senator from Louisiana that using the word "appropriations" in the all-inclusive sense, in which it has been used in the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia and adopted by the committee, is very different from using it as it is employed in the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana, for the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana is intended, as I understand, to be a limitation upon the reduction which can be made in particular appropriations. But there is no definition of the term "appropriation" as used in the Senator's amendment.

Therefore I was seeking to obtain from him an interpretation of what he intended by the word "appropriation," whether he meant the particular items or not.

As the Senator knows so well, as he is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, there are items set out for appropriation in an appropriation act, then there is an over-all appropriation for the entire act, and then there are headings in each act, which have totals. What I am seeking to ascertain from the Senator is whether or not he intends his limitation to apply to the entire appropriation contained in the appropriation act, whether he intends it to apply to the specific items of appropriation, or whether he intends it to apply to the particular subtotals.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator, since I offered my amendment it has been submitted to the legislative council, and they have revised it, and I shall offer it now in a modified form. It will read as follows, and I direct the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to it, because I think in its present form it answers the objection he made to the amendment.

On page 33, line 7, after the word "affected," it is proposed to insert a colon and the following:

Provided, That in no case shall any appropriation item contained in any act appropriating money for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, be reduced by more than 25 percent.

I ask permission to modify the amendment offered by me so as to read as I have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER The amendment will be modified as suggested.

Mr. OVERTON. I understand the amendment I have offered is not objected to by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I think this discussion thoroughly demonstrates the danger of adopting an amendment as far-reaching as the one now offered merely by its inclusion in the action of the Finance Committee without hearings on it in the committee.

In the first place, this amendment is what is generally called a "rider." It is in a bill to raise revenue, but it deals with appropriations. That is not in line with orderly procedure; it is not in line with the accustomed practice in both Houses of the Congress.

If the amendment had been introduced as a bill, it would not have gone to the Committee on Finance. The Committee on Finance has no control over expenditures of the Government. The Committee on Finance is charged with the duty of recommending methods of raising money to meet the obligations created by the Committee on Appropriations, of course, with the approval of the Congress. We find in a tax bill what is commonly referred to as the Byrd economy amendment. It is perfectly apparent that Senators on the floor do not understand its provisions; at least, they are not in agreement, as manifested by many questions which have been presented, and the different explanations which have been made.

As I have just intimated—and I do not care to go into the details of the discussion, because I am quite anxious to cooperate with the leadership in expediting action on the bill—it is perfectly clear, to my mind, at least, that a subject so comprehensive as is this amendment, involving perhaps the financial welfare, either in the matter of income or in the matter of continued employment, of practically every employee in the service of the United States, should have more careful, more thorough investigation and consideration, so that we would know just what effect it would have on the various groups of employees and upon the individual employees of the Government.

We find here what is commonly accepted as a delegation of legislative power to the Executive. I have seen the time, as most other Senators have, when, if a suggestion such as this had been made from other sources, promptly the resistence of many Senators upon this floor would have been raised with vehemence and vigor and determination.

What does this amendment propose? It is far broader and more extensive than the bill delegating to the President the power of reorganization; it is far more comprehensive, because under this a delegation is sought to be made which would permit the President to decide where reductions in appropriations, deliberately made by Congress, should be applied, even to the extent of the suspension of bureaus, of activities, of entire agencies, as I conceive it, if the President decided that course were necessary in order to accomplish the desired reduction in expenditures.

Mr. President, I submit that the plan is not consistent with the previous record of the Senate upon the subject of the delegation of power. I supported the plan to enable the President to reorganize the departments and agencies, but Senators who are now supporting the pending amendment did not go along at that time and in that way. Here is a provision for power beyond that.

Under the reorganization plan the President was merely given power to decide in what department certain bureaus should work and certain agencies should perform their duties, with an express limitation that no functions of government should be changed or controlled by that reorganization program.

But I take it under this amendment the President could suspend or put on furlough the employees in any bureau, in any division. There may be some limitation contained in the Overton amendment as to the number, but certainly up to 25 percent of the employees could be furloughed, and unless Congress has been appropriating money recklessly, the furlough of 25 percent of the employees of any bureau or any agency or any department of the Government would certainly be ruinous to the public service which the Congress has delegated to such bureau or agency or department.

So, Mr. President, I submit that the matter ought not to be decided in the way here proposed.

We are now told that the amendment does not apply to salaries of employees under the Classification Act. Who is included under that act, and who is excluded? The Classification Act applies to the employees working in the District of Columbia. By some process of reasoning it has been given application, as I understand, in a general way to similarly employed Federal workers outside the District of Columbia, but literally and strictly speaking the application is to employees within the District of Columbia.

Are all the employees in the District under the Classification Act? I do not have the figures. I asked the Senator from Virginia if he had them, and he said he understood that about 10 percent of the Federal employees were not under the Classification Act. Is that correct, I ask the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BYRD. I will say to the Senator from Alabama that there are three classifications of salaries. One is the salaries of the Post Office employees, customs officers, immigration officers, school teachers, and other groups that are fixed within limitations by special pay statutes. They would be exempted because they are fixed charges.

The next group is the salaries of a relatively few emergency agencies that are fixed within limitations by Executive order, and can be changed whenever the President chooses to change them. We are now giving the President no more authority with respect to that group than he already has.

And, third, virtually all other salaries are determined by the Salary Classification Act. I think that is practically inclusive, with the exception of the first two groups I have mentioned.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The able and distinguished Senator, whose motives I appreciate not only on this occasion but on all occasions when Government expenditures are involved, and who is always frank, as we all know, makes it clear that practically all the employees are under the Classified Act in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, generally speaking. So from what source are the savings in the matter of salaries coming? Where will a saving of 25 percent be obtained if at most only 10 percent of the employees are not under the Classification Act? Of course, the salaries of those employees could not be reduced in any substantial way.

If a saving should be sought by the reduction of salaries of 10 percent of the employees—and I suspect that most of them are in the lower-income groups—what saving would result? How can economy or saving be brought about in that way?

The only other way to do it is to eliminate the employees, to take them off the pay roll. How will that be accomplished? Most of them are under civil service. Who will select the ones to be discharged? Will the Republicans be let out? Will the Democrats be let out? Will some system of merit rating control eliminations, or will it be done blindfolded, or will the chiefs of some bureaus be allowed to decide who will go off the pay roll and who will stay on?

Mr. President, a sword of financial insecurity will hang over the head and disturb the work of every Federal employee who comes under the operation of this provision. In one way or another all Federal employees will come under it, because if salaries cannot be reduced, employees can be eliminated.

They can be put out entirely, thus taking away from them 100 percent of their salaries, instead of 10 percent, or 25 percent, or 50 percent.

It has been said here, I do not know on what authority, that the President has the right, after Congress has made an appropriation, to reduce the appropriation by holding back the expenditure of the money. I do not know of any such authority.

Mr. OVERTON. It is done.

Mr. BANKHEAD. My friend, the Senator from Louisiana, says it is done, but I do not know of any such authority. I am a member of the great Committee on Appropriations. I have taken an active interest in its deliberations. My friend, the Senator from Louisiana, is a diligent member of that committee. I have never heard any appropriation bill considered in that committee from the standpoint that the Congress will appropriate so much money to be spent for a special Government service, but that the President, after having approved the bill and made it a part of the law of the land, may still have the power to reduce it. If he has that power, how much can he reduce it? If he can reduce it by 1 percent he can reduce it by 100 percent, and thereby repeal and nullify the action of Congress upon that subject. I submit there is no such authority and no such power in the Executive.

Many legislators have advocated giving the Executive the power to veto particular items in appropriation bills. In fact, that principle has been established in a large number of the American States. There is merit in the proposal. There are two sides to the question, of course. But to suggest that the President can nullify an appropriation by withholding the money appropriated is to suggest a substitute for a power which confessedly the President does not possess under the Constitution, namely, to approve an appropriation bill and at the same time veto an item in it.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. BYRD. If the Senator will make inquiry of the Bureau of the Budget he will find that the President has reduced an appropriation. The Senator says the President does not have the authority to do it, but it has been done. Furthermore, he has the authority to require the heads of departments to dismiss employees. He has that power now.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, it is not exercised in any such broad, sweeping way as the Senator indicates, and if exercised, I do not approve it.

I think the President ought to be given some power if we deal with the subject at all. I think he needs it. I think he ought to be authorized to make reductions up to a certain point. I am clear in my own mind that he cannot reduce classified salaries or unclassified salaries unless given the authority. He cannot do it, of course, by elimination, by simply directing the removal, or suspension, or furloughing of an indefinite number of employees. I think no one in the Senate wants administration conducted upon the basis of wholesale furloughs without specific reasons, or on the basis of picking out here and there a place to release a large number of civil-service employees, forsooth, and certain employees under the classified-salary act.

Mr. President, where will the President make the reductions proposed under this program? Where will the ax fall, as the Senator from Wisconsin suggested? It is agreed that it cannot be done in the Department of State. The Senator from Virginia properly stated that he did not think these eliminations and reductions could be made there.

The War Department and the Navy Department are especially exempted, and properly so, in this emergency.

The Senator from New York [Mr. MEAD] was chairman of the House Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and no man has greater information about the Post Office Department and its fiscal affairs than has the distinguished junior Senator from New York. He and the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] have long dealt with that subject and are experts in it. The Senator from New York pointed out that the reductions and eliminations cannot be made in the Post Office Department.

They cannot be made, as was stated by the chairman of the Finance Committee, as I recall, in the Treasury Department.

So, where are they to be made? It is admitted they cannot be made in the Department of Justice. Seven out of the ten regular departments of the Government, by admissions made on the floor of the Senate, cannot be touched under this reduction program. At least no material and substantial reduction can be made in all those seven departments. So, we come down to the Department of Labor. There is not much opportunity for reduction there. It is not a big Department. In personnel, it is one of the smallest departments in the Government. We cannot reduce the salaries. The employees are all under the civil service and under the Salary Classification Act.

What have we left? There is the Department of the Interior. That Department reaches out into the rural areas of the country. There is also the Department of Agriculture. That is where the load falls. There is the same old fight which the Senate had this year and last year on the appropriation bills which have been brought before the Congress—the fight of the friends of the farmers to protect them in the matter of a proper share in the distribution of appropriations by the Congress.

Mr. President, I know that the motives of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] are worthy; but it is apparent that he has not thought out to the last analysis the effect of his amendment and considered where the ax would fall.

It is admitted that the soil-conservation fund is exempt. We next come to the parity payments which we have had so much trouble in establishing as a proper policy of the Government. Parity payments represent a distribution which has been promised to the farmers since the first tariff law as a partial compensation to them for carrying the burden necessary to support the protected industries of the country. Finally the principle was established, and now it is proposed to take away a portion of those payments with a short resolution in the name of national defense.

How many sins are to be committed in the name of national defense, unfurling the flag where it has no place? We have before us a national-defense measure. The pending amendment seeks to give to the President power to make reductions. Let us not forget that the President has not been an enthusiastic supporter of parity payments. As was brought out earlier in the debate, parity payments were not included in the Budget estimate for this Congress or the previous Congress. There the ax must fall almost entirely, if a reduction of 10 percent, or anythink like it, is approached in this readjustment.

The field representatives are not under the Classification Act. The agents out in the field, the enforcement committees, and all the employees of the rural-rehabilitation program, are subject not only to reduction but to elimination. They are not under civil service. They are not under the Salary Classification Act. They have no protection unless their friends in Congress protect them. As a member of the Appropriations Committee, I am willing at any time, as I have announced many times, to begin with the first appropriation bill coming before Congress and scale down all the way through; but I have found, and Senators have observed, that the disposition has been to disregard a program of that sort until the agricultural appropriation bill is reached. I can prove that by the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. President, I shall not take any further time. I hope the matter will not be dealt with in this brief and summary way, without hearings by an amendment reported by a committee which does not properly have jurisdiction of the subject.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. The Senator has no objection to my amendment, has he? As I understand, his whole argument is addressed to the committee amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The only objection I have to the Senator's amendment is that if we are to put a limit on the reduction, it ought to be 10 percent and not 25 percent. I do not think the President ought to have power to go as high as 25 percent in reducing the salaries of any employees, or in reducing the number of employees engaged in any operation.

Let me add one further observation. The bill provides for a reduction of 10 percent of the total amount of "the appropriations affected." What appropriations are affected? Take the case of the appropriations in the Treasury Department: Is the entire Treasury Department appropriation bill affected? What does "appropriations affected" mean? The language is "10 percent of the total amount of the appropriations affected." Does that mean for the individual? The provision is that the reduction shall not be less than 10 percent of the total amount of the appropriations affected.

Mr. BYRD. The appropriations affected are the nondefense appropriations, excluding national defense, fixed charges, and trust funds. That is very clear.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does that include all Departments? It is admitted by Senators who are supporting the measure that a number of appropriations may not be reduced 10 percent. If we have to reduce all of them except appropriations for the War Department, the Navy Department, and a few specified independent agencies such as the Senator has mentioned, we shall certainly destroy the efficiency of some of the most necessary departments of the Government.

Mr. BYRD. The Senator must be aware that the proposal is not for a horizontal cut in all departments.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; but it is 10 percent in every department affected.

Mr. BYRD. No; that is the amount of it—

In such manner that the total amount of such reductions shall not be less than 10 percent of the total amount of the appropriations affected.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The total amount of what?

Mr. BYRD. The total amount of the appropriations affected, which are nondefense appropriations. The Senator is an able lawyer, and I am not; but it is very clear to me that that is simply the standard by which the total amount of the reduction is to be determined.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is the kind of risk which the Senate is taking when it approves the amendment.

Mr. President, that is all I have to say.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I take the amendment of the able Senator from Virginia as it is expressed. I do not think there is anything more essential to national defense than the production of that which sustains life; and that which sustains life comes from the earth. The farmers of America, those who produce the sustenance of life, are the defenders of our national existence.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I intended, of course, to include in my discussion the effect upon the relief program, in addition to the effect upon agricultural appropriations. It is said that those are the two agencies which must of necessity bear the brunt of the burden.

Mr. McCARRAN. To continue, as a member of the Appropriations Committee I recall that we were confronted with the parity payments without a Budget estimate, and, indeed, without the accord of the Chief Executive. We put that enormous appropriation over in the Senate Appropriations Committee because we believed the farmers should be encouraged to produce that which sustains life.

To my mind, parity payments may not be essential in the immediate future. To my mind, the agricultural program which has gone forward in the past few years may not be necessary to our national existence. However, I think that when the war is over—and I hope it may be over soon—the conditions in far-flung countries will be such that they will absorb everything the farmers of America can produce. That is my hope. However, my hope may not be realized. My wish and my hope in that respect have not been in accord with the program of the Department of Agriculture.

With that thought in mind, we created a great appropriation to assure the farmers of America a parity payment. I was one of those in the Appropriations Committee of the Senate who voted for the parity payment. To my mind, the parity payment is now about to be scuttled, if I may use a homely expression. While I am making the battle here, and others are joining with me, to the end that wages in America shall not be cut, at the same time I hope to make the battle that farmers may be induced to go forward and produce that which is necessary to sustain life in this Nation and in heartbroken nations abroad. Our surplus may be necessary to succor those who are in despair or who will be in despair in the future.

If the parity payments to the farmers of America can be reduced by either 10 percent or 25 percent, the psychological effect will be to destroy the encouragement which should be held out to them.

I think this would be a grave mistake; I think it would be as grave a mistake as to reduce the appropriations for the building up of the Navy and the Army, because, in the language of Napoleon, "an army fights on its belly," and an army and a navy cannot be maintained secure and content unless they have the sustenance of life.

I have great respect for the junior Senator from Virginia; but if it be the intendment of this amendment to curtail parity payments or to curtail other payments which now afford some encouragement to American farmers, then, with the wage workers of this country, I must join to the end that labor and the farmers shall stand together against this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] to the amendment reported by the committee on page 33. (Putting the question.) By the sound, the Chair is unable to decide.

Mr. OVERTON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. McCARRAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Davis	Lodge	Schwellenbach
Andrews	Donahey	Lucas	Sheppard
Ashurst	Downey	Lundeen	Shipstead
Austin	Ellender	McCarran	Slattery
Bailey	George	McKellar	Smathers
Bankhead	Gerry	McNary	Smith
Barkley	Gillette	Maloney	Taft
Bilbo	Green	Mead	Thomas, Idaho
Bone	Guffey	Miller	Thomas, Okla.
Bridges	Gurney	Minton	Thomas, Utah
Brown	Hale	Murray	Tobey
Bulow	Harrison	Neely	Townsend
Burke	Hatch	Norris	Truman
Byrd	Hayden	Nye	Tydings
Byrnes	Herring	O'Mahoney	Vandenberg
Capper	Hill	Overton	Van Nuys
Caraway	Holman	Pepper	Wagner
Chandler	Holt	Pittman	Walsh
Chavez	Hughes	Radcliffe	White
Clark, Idaho	Johnson, Colo.	Reed	Wiley
Clark, Mo.	King	Reynolds
Connally	La Follette	Russell
Danaher	Lee	Schwartz

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I am opposed to the whole program; I am opposed to the Byrd amendment; and I offer an amendment to the amendment, to strike out "25 percent" and substitute in lieu thereof "10 percent," so that, if the worst should happen, there would not be more than a 10-percent reduction. I think it is fair to state, however, that, even if my amendment shall be adopted, I shall vote against the section as reported by the committee, which is known as the Byrd amendment.

Mr. OVERTON obtained the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. OVERTON. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood the Senator from Virginia to have no objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON].

Mr. OVERTON. That is correct; he has no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. Can we not settle the matter then without a record vote on that basis?

Mr. OVERTON. I should think so. The amendment merely provides a limitation of the authority of the President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana to the committee amendment, on which the yeas and nays have been requested.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Just a moment, Mr. President; I offered an amendment to that amendment. The question, I think, is on my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ADAMS. I do not exactly understand how there can be an amendment to an amendment to an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That would not be in order. The amendment of the Senator from Louisiana providing a limitation of 25 percent, is the question before the Senate.

Mr. HATCH. Did I understand the Chair to say that the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana was not before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is before the Senate now.

Mr. HATCH. Has not the Senator from Alabama offered a perfecting amendment to that amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that the amendment of the Senator from Alabama is out of order, as it would be in the third degree.

Mr. HATCH. The amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama is out of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, it seems to me attention should be called to the fact that the amendment which is now offered by the Senator from Louisiana, attempting to fix a ceiling, as it were, to the amount of reduction that may be placed upon any particular item, would unquestionably have the effect of spreading the reductions over a very much larger field than if the perfecting amendment were not adopted. As it has been presented by the Senator from Virginia, the amendment directs the President to make a total reduction in the appropriations, not including national defense fixed charges and trust funds, of not less than 10 percent. Accordingly, it delegates to the President the discretion to make as great a reduction as may occur to him, and he may make it all out of particular items, as the Senator from Louisiana has very well pointed out. He may take it out of the items that Congress has written into the appropriation bills without the approval of the Budget Bureau.

We all know that the President is bearing a tremendous burden at this time; we all know that it will be physically impossible for him, as an individual, to undertake to make the reductions which the original amendment directs shall be made. As a mater of practical effect, if this basic amendment should become law, the work would be done by the Bureau of the Budget. I think, in that event, we could all very reasonably anticipate that every appropriation which has been written by Congress without an estimate from the Budget Bureau would be cut off in its entirety. Therefore, I have been opposed to this amendment.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. If the Senator will pardon me, I will yield in a moment. I have been opposed to this amendment because I believe that the legislative function is ours, and if we are going to cut appropriations, let us have the good sense and the courage to cut them ourselves. Having written into various appropriation measures, appropriations which we, as the Senate and the House combined, believe should be made, why should we now delegate to the Bureau of the Budget the power to make any cut it sees fit? By so doing we completely sacrifice our control over the appropriations.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. If the Senator from Virginia will pardon me just a moment, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] was asking me to yield, and I really ought to yield to him first; but if the Senators will let me finish this statement I shall then be glad to yield to both of them.

I was merely pointing out that I am opposed to the basic amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia, and reported by the committee, because of this invasion of the power of Congress to make its own appropriations, and because it constitutes a delegation to the Bureau of the Budget of the appropriating power.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. With respect to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana——

Mr. BYRD. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I should prefer to finish this statement, if I may.

Mr. BYRD. I merely want to make a reference to that particular matter.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I shall be very glad to yield.

Mr. BYRD. The Senator said we are delegating authority to the President.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I said "to the Bureau of the Budget."

Mr. BYRD. Well, the President finally exercises it, just as we have delegated to him any amount of other authority. We delegate to him authority to spend billions in lump-sum appropriations.

The Senator knows that all the appropriation bills for the next fiscal year have been passed. The Senator knows that there is no way for us to effect specific reductions in the appropriations themselves except to recall the appropriation bills and rerefer them to the Appropriations Committee, which would take a long time to accomplish. If that were done, probably they would not be effective by July 1, when the new appropriations must become effective; so this is the only way to deal with the subject in the emergency which confronts the country.

Why have we a tax bill here? We would not have a tax bill before us except for the national emergency which confronts America today. For the same reason, this provision is justifiable under these conditions—because of the emergency—and it is the only way in which a reduction can be effected in the appropriations which have already been passed.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I do not agree with the Senator's conclusion. If the Congress desired to assume the responsibility, and desired to make effective the objective which the Senator from Virginia has announced, I think it would be a perfectly simple matter for us to stay here—as we probably shall stay here—without adjournment this summer and go to work on the appropriation bills. I was referring, however, to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. BYRD. Would the Senator favor a resolution to recall all the appropriation bills we have passed, and rerefer them to the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am not ready to say that I would favor that course now; no.

Mr. BYRD. That is the only way in which it can be done.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator is merely saying that Congress has abdicated the power of legislation.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. On the question of procedure, I simply wish to say that I do not believe that is the only way of dealing with the matter, because amendments to the appropriation bills could be made without recalling the appropriation bills themselves.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, if I may add another word, the great majority of the appropriation bills have already been passed and have become law by the signature of the President.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That would not make it at all impossible or difficult for any Member of this body to introduce a measure providing for paring appropriations for the fiscal year 1941. There would be no difficulty whatever about the Appropriations Committee meeting, distributing this task among the various subcommittees, going over each appropriation measure item by item, and determining what appropriations should be sacrificed.

I desire now, however, to refer to the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] placing an upper limit of 25 percent upon the reduction that may be made upon any particular item. That necessarily would require the reduction of many more items than the original amendment, in its unamended form, would require.

From the discussion which has taken place here this afternoon, it seems to me to be quite clear that the majority of the Members of this body do not want to undertake now to reduce salaries. The sponsor of the amendment has gone to great trouble to explain that salaries are not intended to be included; but if we impose this upper limit of 25 percent, it seems to me it will be practically impossible to make any effective reduction at all unless we go into the item of the compensation of employees. I feel that there are many employees of the Government, particularly those who receive $5,000 a year or more, who might very well sustain a cut; but there are many other employees of the Government, in the lower brackets, who could not sustain such a cut.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I do.

Mr. BARKLEY. The same employees who might stand a cut in their salaries are taxed in this bill by lowering the brackets and increasing the income taxes just as everybody else is being affected; so to do that would be, in effect, levying a double tax on them—a tax by reason of the reduction of their compensation, as well as the income taxes they will pay under the new schedules.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator is quite right. It would undoubtedly have that effect.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. I should like to reiterate what has been repeatedly said today—that the Budget Director and the Treasury Department have given a ruling that under this joint resolution it is not legally possible to reduce the classification standard of salaries.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Then the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana has the effect of contradicting the direction which is contained in the original amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I should like to ask the Senator if it would not be possible to reduce the salary by changing the grade—in other words, by demoting the employee.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Of course. The Senator from Alabama is quite right. The statement is based wholly upon an interpretation of "fixed charges," as I understand, and is an expression of an intention; but when the joint resolution directs, or attempts to direct, a total cut of not less than 10 percent in a total of certain appropriations, and then in the next amendment says, "but not more than 25 percent upon any particular item," it seems to me we are in danger of having two contradictory proposals in the amendment.

That suggests to my mind another thought: The amendment itself is not clear, as the Senator from Alabama has very well pointed out. There is no definition here of the appropriations affected. An appropriation which would be reduced 10 percent would be an appropriation affected. An appropriation which would be reduced 25 percent under the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana would also be an appropriation affected; but the general language of the original amendment says:

> In such manner that the total amount of such reductions shall not be less than 10 percent of the total amount of the appropriations affected.

Obviously that is a contradiction in terms. The language of the amendment is not clear. There is in this amendment an attempt to exclude appropriations for national defense. What is an appropriation for national defense? We passed the relief joint resolution here the other day; but, as I recall, that relief measure contained a provision to the effect that there should be certain noncombatant training for the C. C. C. enrollees. Is that an expenditure for national defense? And how many others are for national defense? If the war abroad has taught us anything, it has taught us that we are living in an era of total war. The building of roads, the improvement of rivers and harbors, the provision of C. C. C. camps, the raising of crops, parity payments to farmers—all these are items which may easily be regarded as items of national defense, and an argument will be raised every time any attempt may be made under this appropriation to effect a reduction. It seems to me the sensible, sane thing to do about this matter is for Congress to assume its legislative duty.

My attention was called by another Senator a moment ago to the fact that upon this floor a few days ago the committee brought in an amendment to a bill providing that there should be a reduction of expenditures by the Treasury Department. The Treasury Department was to be permitted, in the Procurement Division, to save a million or a million and a half dollars. The matter was debated upon this floor, and the Senate was almost a unit in declaring, "We shall not permit the executive department to make this reduction of a million and a half dollars." Now, we are asked to reverse that position and extend to the executive department a blanket invitation to make any cut it sees fit, not less than 10 percent in any item that the executive department may choose, without any review on the part of Congress.

Mr. President, it seems to me to be an utterly objectionable surrender of legislative authority.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, what is the vote to be taken on?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] to the amendment of the committee on page 33.

Mr. ADAMS. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. ADAMS. As I understand, the ruling of the Chair is that the amendment of the Senator is not open to amendment so as to change the percentage fixed in the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. ADAMS. In other words, if a Member of the Senate preferred to have the 25 percent either increased or decreased, the only way that could be accomplished would be by defeating the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana and then offering an amendment with a different figure in it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. Is there a second to the request of the Senator from Louisiana for the yeas and nays?

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Calloway, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8668) making appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, for civil functions administered by the War Department, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were signed by the Vice President:

S. 2611. An act authorizing the purchase of a site and the erection of a building in the State of Massachusetts for use as a radio-monitoring station, and for other purposes;

S. 2983. An act to authorize the sale of lumber and other forest products obtained from the forests on Indian reservations by Indian enterprises;

S. 2984. An act authorizing the transfer of title of the Hayward Indian School to the State of Wisconsin;

S. 3018. An act to amend section 210 of the Communications Act of 1934, approved June 19, 1934 (48 Stat. 1073; 47 U. S. C. 210), so as to permit communication utilities to contribute free services to the national defense;

S. 3237. An act to amend section 301 (a) of the Sugar Act of 1937;

S. 3352. An act to amend the act of August 27, 1935 (49 Stat. 2194), and for other purposes;

S. 3667. An act to provide for the local delivery rate on certain first-class mail matter;

S. 3958. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to grant to the Road Department of the State of Florida an easement for a road right-of-way over the Coast Guard Reservation at Flagler Beach, Fla.; and

S. J. Res. 214. Joint resolution authorizing the recognition of the two hundredth anniversary of the founding of the University of Pennsylvania by Benjamin Franklin and the beginning of university education in the United States, and providing for the representation of the Government and people of the United States in the observance of the anniversary.

REVENUE BILL OF 1940

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10039) to provide for the expenses of national preparedness by raising revenue and issuing bonds, to provide a method for paying for such bonds, and for other purposes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the pending amendment, on page 33, lines 1 and 2, to strike out the words "and directed."

I shall say only a word about the amendment. I offer it because I do not believe that in its present form the committee amendment is workable. In addition to what the Senator from Wyoming has said about authority over appropriations, I do not believe it is wise legislation, under the circumstances of the present, or, indeed, under any circumstances, for Congress by piecemeal to appropriate money which it thinks is needed for the various departments of the Government, and then later say that the President is directed, is commanded, to reduce the appropriations by 10 percent.

I realize that the Senator from Virginia is sincere about this matter. It is one of the things about which he has thought much and to which he has given great study, and I hesitate to interfere with an amendment which has been voted by the Committee on Finance, of which I am a member. I happened not to be in the meeting of the committee at the time the amendment was offered, because I had to be on the floor of the Senate. It was taken up after the hour of 12 o'clock.

If I had been in attendance at the time the Senator offered the amendment in the committee I would then have moved to strike out the words "and directed."

In order that the President may carry out this mandate as to all the appropriations which have been enacted by the Congress for the national defense, all salaries are to be exempted. I am not in favor of cutting salaries, because most of those whose salaries would be cut, as I indicated a moment ago, would be taxed under the schedules of the pending bill anyway, because their exemptions would be lowered, and to some extent the rates would be effective in their cases. Every man and woman who is an employee of the United States Government, who comes within the brackets provided, will be taxed just as everyone else will be taxed, and I am not willing at this stage, at least, in this emergency, to place a double burden or a double penalty on them because they happen to be working for the Government.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Would the Senator be willing to give the value of his support to the suggestion of the committee, as embodied in the Byrd amendment, with the change that the President would be "authorized and respectfully requested"?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know that the word "respectfully" is necessary.

Mr. HARRISON. Nor do I.

Mr. BARKLEY. It would be presumed that it was done in a respectful manner. I would certainly prefer the words "authorized and requested" to the words "authorized and directed," because I think the proposal as it is now worded is inconsistent. Congress has passed a number of bills in the last few days, and the emergency was just as great then as it is now. Less than a week ago we passed a relief bill, which will be affected by the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, because if we are to eliminate these other items, the main place where the cuts will be required, where they will be mandatory, and will be more than any 10 percent, if the President is to reach an average of 10, will be in agriculture and in relief. There is no escape from that conclusion, in my judgment.

Mr. HARRISON. In the interest of attempting to get together, will the Senator agree if we strike out the word "respectfully" and just say "authorized and requested"?

Mr. BARKLEY. I should be willing to support that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I would object to that.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think I should be willing to go along with the committee if the language were changed so that it would be in the discretion of the President to determine whether he should cut the appropriations 10 percent or any other amount; but I do not feel justified in voting to command the President to bring about such a readjustment of appropriations we have made within the last 3 weeks or the last 10 days, if he has to bring about an average cut of 10 percent. I do not believe he can bring about an average cut of 10 percent in the field to which he is restricted without making a much greater cut than 10 percent, or even the 25 percent suggested by the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I address myself now to the remarks of the able chairman of the Committee on Finance, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. When did the people of this country lose their authority over this Government to such an extent that they would "respectfully request" anyone to do anything?

Mr. HARRISON. Let me say to the Senator that I withdraw the suggestion I made if it will end this debate, and we can get along. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCARRAN. Then the Senator suggested the word "request." The people of this country are sovereign, and they do not request any one to do anything.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, we may as well face the situation frankly. If the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky is agreed to it will cut the heart out of the amendment. The President already has the authority to reduce these expenditures. He has been claiming that he has been reducing them. To eliminate the words "and directed," and say that he is authorized to reduce the expenditures, merely means nothing. I for one am not willing to mislead the people of this country into the thought that the adoption of this amendment, as modified by the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, would result in a reduction of nondefense spending, the money to be devoted to the essential purposes of the defense program.

I have listened to the argument this afternoon with great interest. We are told that we are in a great crisis, and we all realize that we are. We all know we are faced with colossal expenditures for national defense. Why have we a tax bill before us today? Thirty days ago there was no intimation that we would be asked to provide $1,000,000,000 more in taxes for the purpose of national defense. We are doing this because of the emergency with which this country is confronted because of the conditions which have come about in Europe during the last 30 days.

If this amendment is eliminated, we will be striking from the bill $500,000,000 which could be used for national defense. This tax bill is a meager preparation for what is to come before us. It is totally inadequate to meet the emergency. Under the pending bill we will raise only $700,000,000 for national defense. Now it is proposed to strike from the bill a provision under which $500,000,000 of savings could be effected, and every Senator on this floor knows they could be effected in the nondefense expenditures of our Government and the money diverted to the needs of national defense.

I know there is nothing I can say at this late hour to change the minds of Senators, but I want to say to the patrons of the amendment that if the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky shall prevail, it will cut the heart out of the amendment, and, so far as I am concerned, I shall then ask that the amendment be stricken from the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may we have the amendment stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 33, line 1, in the amendment of the committee, to strike out the words "and directed", so that it will read:

> The President is hereby authorized to reduce appropriations for the executive branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941 (except appropriations for national defense, fixed charges, and trust funds), in such manner that the total amount of such reductions shall not be less than 10 percent of the total amount of the appropriations affected. Such reductions in appropriations shall be impounded and returned to the Treasury.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHANDLER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], who is detained on important public business. Not knowing how he would vote, I am compelled to withhold my vote.

Mr. HOLMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. STEWART]. I am advised that if present he would vote "yea." If at liberty to vote I should vote "nay."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. I am informed that if present he would vote "nay." If at liberty to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS of Utah (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE]. I am not advised how either Senator would vote if present. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. LUNDEEN], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. STEWART], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are necessarily absent from the Senate.

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] has a pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]. If present, the Senator from Vermont would vote "nay" on this question, and the Senator from Montana would vote "yea."

I announce that the Senators from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER and Mr. NYE], the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] is absent on official duties.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] has been called away on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 36, as follows:

YEAS—41

So Mr. BARKLEY's amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, referring to the committee amendment which has just been amended, I call attention to the fact that as the amendment is now drawn, because of the language in lines 5 to 7, the following situation could arise: If the President, in the calculation of the savings he is directed to effect, or authorized to effect, should find that he could make a saving of 8 percent or 9 percent or 9½ percent, he would be prohibited from doing so, because he is directed to reduce appropriations in such manner that the total amount of such reductions shall be not less than 10 percent of the total amount of the appropriations affected. I do not think we want to leave the provision in that way, so that if the President can make a reduction of 9½ percent he may not do so. If he can make such a reduction it ought to be made. If he can make a reduction of 9 percent it ought to be made. Therefore I ask the Senator from Kentucky if his amendment should not be changed so as to read substantially as follows:

> The President is hereby authorized to reduce appropriations for the executive branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941—
>
> And so on—
> to an amount not greater than 15 percent—

Or 25 percent or 20 percent or 10 percent, any figure that the Senator wants to put in, of the total of the appropriations affected by such reductions? Unless we do that we simply authorize the President to make a reduction, and tell him that unless the reduction can amount to at least 10 percent, no reduction whatsoever shall be made.

The Senator from Virginia a few moments ago mentioned the fact that reductions in appropriations have been made by the President. If we adopt this amendment, we will be telling him in no uncertain langauge that unless he can make a total reduction of at least 10 percent he cannot make any reduction at all.

I ask the Senator from Kentucky if I am not correct in my conclusion?

Mr. BARKLEY. I appreciate the force of what the Senator from Michigan states. Of course, I would not want the Senate to put itself in the situation of authorizing the President to do something, and fixing the amount at 10 percent and thereby preventing him from making any saving. The Senator from Virginia indicated a while ago that if the amendment I offered was adopted, he would lose interest in the matter because he did not think it would result in any saving.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I say that I intend to vote against the committee amendment because as now amended it means nothing. The Senator from Kentucky has cut the heart out of any saving.

Mr. BARKLEY. In view of that statement, we might simplify the matter by all of us agreeing to vote to strike out the amendment, or not to agree to the amendment as amended.

Mr. BYRD. I make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ELLENDER in the chair). The Senator from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] has the floor.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the amendment is to remain in the bill undoubtedly the language ought to be framed so as to authorize the President to make such reductions as he finds possible, without any limitation. I do not see any need for putting a maximum in it, but I think that it might be advisable to eliminate the minimum, because the President may not be able to make reductions.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, for the reasons stated by the Senator from Louisiana, there ought to be some proper limit beyond which he cannot go, such as the 25 percent he suggested, or 20 percent.

Mr. BARKLEY. My objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Louisiana, as he will recall, was that it would make the President appear to be going in two directions; by going in one direction he would save 10 percent as a whole, and by going in another direction he could not save more than 25 percent on any item, and he might find it inconsistent to carry out the two mandates of the Congress.

Mr. BROWN. The amendment, which was suggested originally by the Senator from Virginia, was adopted by the Finance Committee, and, of course, the Senator from Virginia has no right to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. I appreciate that.

Mr. HARRISON. Has the Senator an amendment which he suggests?

Mr. BROWN. Yes. The language of my amendment would be the same as the language of the committee amendment, as amended, down to line 5, and after the word "funds" to insert:

To an amount not greater than 20 percent of the total of the appropiations affected by such reductions.

I think that would clear up the situation.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It occurs to me that unless there is some limit placed upon reductions under this system, entire appropriations may be eliminated. In that case full power would be given to the Budget Bureau to rewrite appropriation bills entirely.

If such a policy is to be followed, then all our efforts and time spent on appropriation bills will have been wasted. If that is to be the situation, the whole thing seems to me to be ridiculous. I can understand that reductions could possibly be made without affecting the general-welfare program; but it seems to me that the present proposal would make it possible, in some instances, to wipe out an entire act of Congress. I do not know what power there would be to increase other appropriations by transferring money from one fund to another. That question arises in my mind.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, the amendment which I have proposed places an upper limit of 20 percent on the amount of the reduction which may be made by the President in any appropriation. That is certainly far superior to the language as it stands, which would mean that he might not make any reduction unless he reduced all appropriations 10 percent.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to ask the Chair what the situation is. Did the Senator from Virginia move to strike out the committee amendment? Is that the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan proposed an amendment to the pending amendment.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then the Senator from Virginia did not move to strike out the committee amendment?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, it is not necessary to move to strike out a committee amendment. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Would it be possible so to limit or amend the amendment as to provide for a horizontal reduction of not more than 10 percent in an appropriation whenever possible?

Mr. BROWN. I think that is possible, but in my judgment it is not desirable, for the many reasons which have been stated by various Senators.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I wonder if we may have the Senator's amendment read again.

Mr. BROWN. As the section would read if amended in accordance with my amendment?

Mr. McCARRAN. Yes.

Mr. BROWN. The section would then read:

The President is hereby authorized to reduce appropriations for the executive branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941 (except appropriations for national defense, fixed charges, and trust funds), to an amount not greater than 20 percent of the total of each of the appropriations affected by such reductions. Such reductions in appropriations shall be impounded and returned to the Treasury.

Mr. McCARRAN. Will the Senator kindly explain to the Senate how his amendment differs from the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON]?

Mr. BROWN. The change made by the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky and agreed to by the Senate brings about a result whereby the President is merely authorized to reduce appropriations, whereas the language of the committee amendment directs him to make reductions. My amendment does not differ from the ideas expressed by the Senator from Louisiana, except that I have made the figure 20 percent instead of 25.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. Let me say to the Senator that he has wholly misconstrued my amendment. The pending amendment authorizes the President to reduce the total nondefense appropriations to the extent of 20 percent; and if this amendment were adopted the President might entirely obliterate the appropriations covering parity payments, and not simply reduce them by 20 percent.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator did not correctly hear me when I read my amendment.

Mr. OVERTON. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BROWN. Let me read it to the Senator again. Possibly I left out the words which I added some time ago. The language of my amendment is—

To an amount not greater than 20 percent of the total of each of the appropriations affected by such reductions.

Mr. OVERTON. Would the language "of each of the appropriation items" be acceptable to the Senator?

Mr. BROWN. I shall be glad to accept it.

Mr. OVERTON. It would then read, "of each of the appropriation items affected by such reduction."

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I appreciate the viewpoint of many Senators who fear that a 10-percent reduction might work a hardship on some particular department which they feel should not suffer a reduction. I am wondering whether or not there is sufficient sentiment on the floor to substitute the amendment designed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], and provide for a 4- or 5-percent saving, rather than to leave the section in its present indefinite form.

I do not know that a reduction of 5 percent would save very much money. It would save probably $200,000,000 or $250,000,000. Perhaps that percentage is too high. However, I respectfully submit that if we can save money it is better to do so affirmatively, as we ought to do as a legislative body, and count it as saved, than to put $250,000,000 of unnecessary taxation on the people to raise the money which we might have saved.

I should appreciate a suggestion as to whether or not we could reinstate the amendment directing the President to make a 5-percent reduction, making it mandatory, and allowing him discretion as to where the reduction is to be made. If we do not do that, we are certainly confronted with the necessity of $250,000,000 of additional taxation.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to the present situation. The Senate has just decided that the words "and directed" shall be stricken from the amendment, leaving the word "authorized." I was against that proposal. I voted with the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. TYDINGS. I noticed that.

Mr. BROWN. I was in favor and am in favor of the original proposal of the Senator from Virginia, but when the situation reached the point where it now is, I concluded that it was necessary to change the amendment so as to give the President power to reduce expenditures by 1 percent, 5 percent, or 9 percent. It seems to me the logical thing to do is to perfect the Barkley amendment in the manner I have outlined, to which I think there is now no opposition after adopting the suggestion made by the Senator from Louisiana. If the perfected amendment is not desired by the Senate, the Senate may vote it down. Then the Senator from Maryland may offer the amendment he suggests.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is absolutely correct in what he has said—that as the amendment is now designed it would prohibit the President from making a cut of less than 10 percent. I appreciate the fact that the amendment ought to be perfected in line with the Senator's suggestion.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] has worked on the amendment, and has given it much thought. I wonder if he would feel inclined, after the amendment is perfected, to offer the 5-percent mandatory amendment as a substitute for the perfected amendment. If he does not wish to do so, I shall be delighted to offer it, to see whether or not the Senate is in favor of a 5-percent amendment. If such an amendment does not carry we can try 4 percent, then 3, then 2, then 1, then one-half of 1 percent, and then a quarter of 1 percent, and perhaps we can save a cent somewhere before we go home.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wish to say to the Senator from Maryland that my objection to the language of the amendment related to the part of it which directed and commanded the President to bring about a reduction of not less than a certain percentage. My objection to that language would apply to 5 percent or any other percentage just as much as to 10 percent.

The Senate, by the vote it cast a while ago, evidently indicated that it wishes to authorize the President to make reductions, but does not wish to command him to do so. I think the amendment of the Senator from Michigan corrects the situation growing out of the adoption of my amendment a while ago, and I am prepared to support his amendment; but I cannot agree to any language which is mandatory, and which commands the President, after we have made appropriations, to go about reducing them. However, I am willing to authorize him to reduce them. I am willing to call his attention to the desirability of a reduction if a reduction is possible, but I am not willing to order him to make a reduction.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. BYRD. The Senator from Kentucky knows that the President already has power to withhold appropriations; so the suggested language would be useless verbiage.

Mr. BARKLEY. I realize that the President has power to withhold the expenditure of money appropriated by Congress, and that all Presidents have exercised the authority. Undoubtedly, he may withhold appropriations in practically all departments in some way. There is no direct statute which authorizes him to do it, but for years all Presidents have exercised that authority.

Mr. BYRD. The suggested amendment would add nothing to his authority?

Mr. BARKLEY. It would add nothing to his authority, but it would call attention to the desirability of a reduction if it is found possible to make a reduction.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I voted against the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] for two reasons.

First, I did not believe the Senate or Congress should—if I may use the expression—"pass the buck" to the President of the United States. If any reduction is to be made, and if it is the sincere wish and desire of the Senate to reduce expenditures, I think it is the duty of this body to write into the bill the mandatory provision which the Senate believes should be written into it, and not confer upon the President of the United States a blanket, naked authority which we ourselves in all likelihood would make it almost impossible for him to exercise. I say that because without any great stretch of the imagination I can visualize that if the President of the United States should seek to exercise this authority in my State in the relief rolls among the persons who are hungering and suffering in New Mexico, I would be the first one to go to the White House and ask the President to repudiate the authority which we had passed to him. I know full well, too, that when the question arises of parity payments to the farmers of this country—and even the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan providing for a 20-percent cut takes $40,000,000 from the pockets of the farmers of the country—and they come to the Senate or to the House of Representatives, we shall be the first ones on the White House doorsteps asking the President not to exercise the authority which we are today writing into the bill.

Secondly, I also thought the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] had brought before this body a clean-cut proposition on which he was entitled to a vote. Frankly, I intended to vote against it, because I do not believe in this method of making reductions. If we do not believe in parity payments, I think we ought to say so and cut out parity payments in their entirety. I do not believe in this blanket, widespread method of making reductions. But the way this matter has developed, if the Senator from Maryland offers his amendment for a straight 5-percent reduction, I shall vote for it and write it firmly and straight into the bill just as it may be.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. A few days ago, when the relief joint resotion was pending, we had submitted to the Senate a proposal to reduce expenditures by a million and a half dollars, so that the Treasury by reorganization could reduce the cost of accounting and procurement proposed by the Budget Director. The Senate, by a vote of 69 to 7, voted against that economy in expenditures. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] called the roll before the clerk did. By the time the clerk called the roll, the Senate had expressed itself. Under either the request of the Senator from Kentucky or that of the Senator from Virginia, the President could effect that economy of a million and a half dollars, could he not?

Mr. HATCH. The Senator may be refreshing my memory on that item, because I voted with the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BYRNES. No; I was merely calling attention to the principle.

Mr. HATCH. I understand. The Senator would have heard me say that day that I doubted that any such economy would work out, and I did doubt it.

Mr. BYRNES. I was merely calling the Senator's attention to the fact that if my thinking is right, only last week, when the Budget Director presented to us a plan by which he said he could save a million and a half dollars without hurting the service of the Government, we did not agree with him. By a vote of 67 to 7 we said, "It cannot be done," and we put back a million and a half dollars into the bill.

The Senate conferees will now go into a conference on that matter. If the Senate really has changed its mind and wants to save money, I wish it would instruct the conferees that they may recede from that million-and-a-half-dollar amendment when the Senate conferees meet tonight with the House conferees on that bill. I should like to be instructed to recede.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just one moment?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I merely wish to call attention to one mistake made by the Senator from South Carolina. He speaks about saving $1,200,000, as provided by the figures. Those savings are not shown by the record. The cut in these particular items was the very cut that we made in the entire measure. Last year it was about a billion and a half. This year it was less than a billion; so the saving goes into thin air.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me at that point for a moment?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from New Mexico a moment ago suggested that the amendment as it now is written "passes the buck" to the President.

Mr. HATCH. I apologize for those words, but that is what I said.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not asking the Senator to apologize. I am not criticizing the words; but my contention and my belief is that the amendment in its original form passed a worse "buck" to the President than the one we are now considering, because it commanded the President to reduce expenditures in the aggregate a certain amount, but passed on to him the "buck" to determine where those reductions should be brought about, so as to make an average of 10 percent; and from my point of view the same objection would apply to a command to reduce expenditures by any other percentage. Under this amendment as it is before us, the President may reduce expenditures wherever he finds it possible to do so, but he may not reduce them more than 20 percent anywhere under the amendment of the Senator from Michigan; but both propositions "pass the buck" to the President. That is one of the evils of them.

Mr. HATCH. If the Senator remembers what I said in the remarks I made, I pointed out exactly that situation, and I said I did not want to "pass the buck" in either case.

Mr. BARKLEY. I realize that; but the Senator also supplemented his remarks by saying he would vote now for another amendment fixing another percentage, and, I presume, including the word "directing"—directing the President also to do that. I think the same evil applies to both. Both propositions "pass the buck"; and the ink has hardly grown dry on some of the bills the President has signed, appropriating this money, when we now come along and direct him to make certain reductions in them, or would have done so under the original language of this amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. I am about to yield the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. I merely wish to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HATCH. Very well.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask that the amendment which has been offered be stated to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. BROWN. I have written it out.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. TYDINGS. As soon as the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] is acted upon, will it not be in order to offer an amendment in line with the wording used by the committee, changing "10 percent" to "5 percent," as a substitute for the perfected amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be in order as a separate amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, may I make a further parliamentary inquiry? Does the Chair hold that if an amendment is offered in line 6 reducing the 10-percent requirement to 5 percent, or any other percentage, it is therefore, or otherwise, in order to move to reinsert the words stricken out by the Senate, "and directed," which were the subject of my amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not if the amendment of the Senator from Michigan is adopted.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the amendment of the Senator from Michigan is adopted, will it not then be in order for the Senator from Maryland, or any other Senator, to offer a substitute for the whole perfected amendment, as follows:

The President is hereby authorized and directed to reduce appropriations for the executive branch of the Government—

And anything else he may desire to include? In other words, a substitute for the perfected amendment will be in order, even though the effect of it were to restore the words "and directed"?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct, if there is a substantial change in the substitute.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out after the parenthesis in line 5, page 33, down to the word "affected", and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

In an amount not greater than 20 percent of any appropriation item contained in any act making appropriations for said fiscal year.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, in every appropriation bill the amount allowed for salaries in any department, and for wages and compensation in that department, is an item. Any member of the Appropriations Committee who now listens to me knows what I am saying to be true. In other words, salaries are items. So we are now directly confronted with a reduction of the items for compensation for the workers under the Federal Government. We cannot avoid this if we vote to sustain the amendment.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I will yield in a moment. Every member of the Committee on Appropriations knows that the overhead is always fixed in one lump item. It is broken down, of course, so that the committee may understand it, but it is a lump item for overhead. It is an item, and it is an item to sustain that particular department by way of paying the wages or the compensation of those who work in the department. The Senator, by his amendment, proposes now to reduce that item, the item of compensation for the workers under the Federal Government. That is a thing which we have been watching here very closely for the past several days.

I do not charge the able Senator from Michigan with understanding that that is the fact, but there should be a pronouncement by the Congress that at this time wages of Federal workers, earnings of Federal workers, are not to be reduced, because the tax bill proposes to broaden the base, thus taking an increase of taxes from every Federal worker, right down to those who earn the smallest wages, and up to those who earn the highest wages.

The amendment now offered by the Senator from Michigan, in my judgment, should not be agreed to. If it shall be, it will be up to the President, if he sees fit, to reduce the wages of the Federal workers.

We have had this question before us previously. In 1933 we reduced by 15 percent the earnings of the Federal workers. We threatened the workers of the United States with a reduction, blanketlike.

In other words, private industry, following the example laid down by the greatest employer of labor, the Federal Government, threatened to reduce wages, and we were on the verge of a great reduction in wages when some of us carried forward the battle to restore to the Federal employees the 15 percent which had been taken from them. We went through that battle for 3 years. The able junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] knows how we carried on, how, little by little, we restored to the toilers under the Federal Government the 15 percent which had been taken from them. But no one knows and no one can estimate what was taken from the Federal employees and was never restored to them.

The Federal employee today is the most underpaid wage worker in this country. Private industry pays by far more than is paid to the men who carry the mail to our doors every day. Private industry pays by far more than is paid to those who work in the navy yard. Private industry pays by far more than does the Federal Government in every line. The Federal employee is compensated with a consideration of his assurance of employment, whereas the private employee is paid with his nonassurance in mind.

Mr. President, if this amendment shall be agreed to, then we will create in the hearts and the minds of the Federal workers an uncertainty which will destroy the principal thing and the principal compensation that is worth while.

In addition to that, in my judgment, the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan will strike again at the very thing that was so ably discussed here this afternoon by the Senator from Alabama, namely, the amendment which has to do with parity payments. If we are to destroy encouragement in industry and agriculture and labor together, then, indeed, we will have weakened our Federal Government from within, whereas we are trying to strengthen it from within so that it may meet opposition from without.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. If the Senator will take page 33 of the bill and read it, he will find that my amendment does not change the Barkley amendment or the Byrd amendment in any particular whatsoever with respect to Federal employees, because I leave in the bill the phrase "except appropriations for national defense, fixed charges, and trust funds." I have been informed by the Senator from Virginia that the fixed charges cover the salaries of Federal employees, and my amendment does not change that in the slightest.

If the Senator will permit me for a moment, the course he should take, in my judgment, would be to permit the perfecting amendment to be agreed to, and then vote against the entire amendment as modified by the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky.

My amendment merely perfects the amendment so that the President will be permitted to make a reduction of less than 10 percent if he desires to do so. The way the Senator from Kentucky amended the provision—and I know he did not intend it that way, it was merely that he had not read down through the latter part of the paragraph—it would have prevented the President from making a reduction unless it was at least of 10 percent in amount. But the fixed charges, which the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Louisiana assure me cover the matter of public salaries, is not changed in any way by my amendment.

Mr. McCARRAN. Let me ask the Senator from Michigan a question. The Senator has very kindly advised me to vote for his proposal, and then vote against the whole amendment. Is the Senator intending to vote against the whole amendment?

Mr. BROWN. I will vote for the amendment, because I do not think we can adopt the Byrd amendment. I tried to have it adopted a few moments ago, but I was unable to do so.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is what I thought, and I was wondering why the Senator was giving me the advice to vote against the Byrd amendment, but to vote for this amendment.

Mr. BROWN. Because I think the Senator wants to vote for the amendment, and I think we do not want to adopt an amendment that will result in preventing the President from making a reduction unless it is at least 10 percent.

Mr. McCARRAN. My judgment—and it is based on my experience of 7 years on the Committee on Appropriations—is that Congress should make the reductions by its own act, and not pass the matter up to the President, because Congress holds the purse strings of the people; Congress exacts taxes, and Congress expends the money. If we wish to reduce salaries, let us be courageous enough to reduce them, and not pass it on to the President, and then say to our constituents, "I am sorry, but the President did this."

Mr. BROWN. I seek merely to perfect the amendment.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I wanted to add just a word to what the Senator from Nevada has said about the effect of the amendment upon the reduction of salaries. I think the Senator from Michigan has overlooked the effect of the holding by the Treasury Department to which the Senator from Virginia referred.

It is true that salaries fixed by law are fixed charges, and it is probably true that the adoption of this amendment would not permit the reduction of a $2,400 salary by any sum whatsoever upon the annual basis, but the amendment would permit the effective reduction of salaries by furlough. All that would be necessary would be to furlough an employee for 2 weeks, 3 weeks, or a month. His rate of salary would not be reduced, but his effective compensation would be reduced, because his work would be cut down.

Mr. BROWN. Granting all the Senator says to be true, and I take it to be true, my amendment would not in any way change that situation.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It would not change the situation, but it would not save the situation about which the Senator from Nevada is arguing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan. [Putting the question to the committee amendment, as amended.]

The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for a division.

On a division, the amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I offer as a substitute for the pending amendment the following:

SECTION 403. The President is hereby authorized and directed to reduce appropriations for the Executive Branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941 (except appropriations for national defense, fixed charges, and trust funds), in such manner that the total amount of such reductions shall not be less than 5 percent of the total amount of the appropriations affected. Such reductions in appropriations shall be impounded and returned to the Treasury.

I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHANDLER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], who is unavoidably detained on important business. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HOLMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. STEWART]. I am advised that if present he would vote "nay." If at liberty to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair as before, I am informed that the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] if present would vote "yea." If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMATHERS], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. STEWART], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are necessarily detained from the Senate.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMATHERS] has a general pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG].

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce the pair of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]. If present the Senator from Vermont would vote "yea" and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] would vote "nay."

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] is absent on official duties.

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 47, as follows:

YEAS—33

Ashurst	Donahey	Lodge	Tobey

So the amendment of Mr. TYDINGS in the nature of a substitute for the committee amendment, as amended, was rejected.

GRANT OF EASEMENT TO CITY OF FARGO, N. DAK.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Ellender in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2059) authorizing a grant to the city of Fargo, N. Dak., of an easement in connection with the construction of water and sewer systems, which were, on page 2, line 4, to strike out all after "meridian;" down to and including "acres" in line 9 and insert "thence north along the north and south quarter line 75 feet to a point; thence east parallel to the east and west quarter line 880 feet to a point; thence south 720 feet to a point; thence west parallel to the east and west quarter line 880 feet to a point on the north and south quarter line; thence north along the north and south quarter line 645 feet to the point of beginning, containing 14.55 acres, more or less"; and on page 2, line 15, to strike out all after "Mitchell." down to and including "land." in line 20.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

HARRIETT BOSWELL, GUARDIAN OF BETTY FISHER—VETO MESSAGE (S. DOC. NO. 221)

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed:

To the United States Senate:

I return herewith, without my approval, the bill S. 1024, "for the relief of Harriett Boswell, guardian of Betty Fisher."

The bill provides payment to Harriett Boswell, guardian of Betty Fisher, of the sum of $2,500 in settlement of any claim of the guardian against the United States for personal injuries to Betty Fisher on January 21, 1937, as the result of an accident in connection with the operation by the Soil Conservation Service of a United States Government truck.

The records available indicate that as a result of the accident Miss Fisher was cut on the right hand and forearm and that her nose was injured; that the cuts on her forearm and hand have healed, and that while there is some slight deformity of her nose, due to the injuries sustained, her physician indicates that this condition can be removed. Moreover, that the medical expenses incurred in connection with this injury were only $16.50.

It appears, therefore, that the proposed payment of $2,500 is excessive in view of the injuries sustained, for which reason I do not feel justified in approving the bill. I would not withhold my approval from a bill which would provide payment of an amount more commensurate with the injuries sustained in this case.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 18, 1940.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR CIVIL FUNCTIONS OF WAR DEPARTMENT—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma submitted the following report:

The Committee of Conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate and amendments of the House to certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8668) making appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, for civil functions administered by the War Department, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, and 11.

Amendment numbered 21: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 21, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 22: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22, and agree to the same.

ELMER THOMAS,
CARL HAYDEN,
JNO. H. OVERTON,
RICHARD B. RUSSELL,
MORRIS SHEPPARD,
JOHN G. TOWNSEND, Jr.,
STYLES BRIDGES,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. BUELL SNYDER,
DAVID D. TERRY,
JOE STARNES,
ROSS A. COLLINS,
JOHN H. KERR,
D. LANE POWERS,
ALBERT J. ENGEL,
FRANCIS CASE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator explain the report?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. This is the second report which has been presented by the conference committee. On a former occasion a partial report was accepted.

The items in controversy related to authorizations. The authorizations were presented to the House and rejected; so the Senate conferees could do nothing but accept the verdict of the House.

There were six amendments. Each one authorized the construction of certain flood-control works. One related to the Arkansas and White River Basins in Oklahoma and Arkansas. It was rejected, and the Senate conferees receded. Another related to work at East Hartford, Conn. The Senate conferees receded and accepted the House verdict. Another related to flood-control work at Prattville, Ala. The Senate conferees had to recede. Another related to flood-control work on the Sacramento River in California. The Senate conferees receded. Likewise, with respect to the Savannah River and Clark Hill Reservoir projects in Alabama and Georgia, respectively, the Senate conferees had to recede, because the House had put the items to a vote, and they were rejected by a vote of 5 or 6 to 1, and the House conferees were adamant. There was nothing left for the Senate conferees to do but to recede.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the conference report? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the report.

The report was agreed to.

REVENUE BILL OF 1940

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10039) to provide for the expenses of national preparedness by raising revenue and issuing bonds, to provide a method for paying for such bonds, and for other purposes.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I shall offer another substitute, calling for a 3-percent saving. It would save only about $150,000,000. That represents about $5 a family, but it would save $150,000,000 of unnecessary new taxation.

I should like to speak for 4 or 5 minutes.

What have we heard in the Senate for the past 4 or 5 weeks? "Stop Hitler! This country is faced with a great emergency. We must sell planes!" We have heard many similar statements during the past 4 or 5 weeks. They have not come from one or two sources. They have come from many sources and have been reflected in a score of bills. Yet today, after the defeat of the amendment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], we are $600,000,000 short of paying for our peacetime routine expenditures, before we appropriate or spend a cent for the Army or the Navy for the past 10 years, the present or the future.

Are we faced with an emergency, or are we not? When Members of Congress go before their constituents as candidates this fall, who supposes that the voters will applaud the kind of false economy represented by the vote not to reduce peacetime expenditures in the light of the emergency which has been pictured on this floor?

The average deficit for the past 10 years has been $2,700,000,000 a year. The average expense for the Army and Navy has been $1,100,000,000 a year. That leaves a deficit of $1,600,000,000 for civil expenditures alone, without considering a cent during the past 10 years for the Army or the Navy.

The bill now before us will raise only $1,000,000,000 of revenue. Therefore, we are $600,000,000 short of sufficient money to pay for our annual peacetime expenditures, even with the bill; and yet the Senate will not vote for a cent of economy, and is going home. The Democratic Party is going before the country in that situation, expecting to be returned to power as these unfolding events—and they will unfold rapidly—overtake the consciousness of the country.

Either there is an emergency or there is not an emergency. If we must have clouds of planes, universal military training, an Army of four or five hundred thousand men, with new equipment for everybody, 83 more new battleships, for which we shall be requested to appropriate in a few days, destroyers, submarines, and new defensive weapons; if the French fleet is important; if the British fleet is important; if the Monroe Doctrine is important; if Red Cross ships are important—if all these emergencies are important, is it not possible that with all the dire events facing this body we can, by economy or new taxation at least, pay the ordinary peacetime expenditures of the Government? Even if we adopt this amendment it will save only $150,000,000, and then we shall be $450,000,000 short of paying the peacetime costs of operating the Government, without a dollar going for the Army or Navy.

That is the picture.

Let me repeat it. The average deficit per year for the past 10 years has been $2,700,000,000. During the past 10 years we have spent an average of $1,100,000,000 a year on the Army and Navy. So if we subtract all the Army and Navy costs from the annual deficit we have a figure of $1,600,000,000 a year by which revenues fail to meet expenditures for the ordinary civil, routine, everyday expenses of the Government from 1930 down to date; and we are going into this terrible emergency, with Hitler shooting in both windows and Mussolini shooting in both doors, without even paying for our routine governmental costs. And this is democracy. Just as England and France failed to prepare for the great attack made upon them, and are now paying in blood, so we are going to be too late, and it will be said that we provided too little.

Either this is an emergency or it is not. We have just appropriated four or five billion dollars for national defense, and there is no need to worry about anything.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I now yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILEY. When the amendment known as the Byrd amendment first was suggested, I thought it was an amendment along the line the Senator had heretofore suggested; namely, that every agency in the Government was going to come forward and say, "We are ready to do our part." But this amendment, and the one on which the Senator is speaking, merely propose a cut in the executive branch. How would it look in the country for us in the legislative branch to say to the country, "We want our $10,000 a year unimpaired."

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me say to the Senator that we will pay. I am ready to take a cut, but the philosophy of this bill is to increase taxes; and the Senator will find that his taxes will be considerably higher under this bill than they were last year.

Mr. WILEY. I appreciate that.

Mr. TYDINGS. But I am willing to take still more of a tax. That, however, is not the question now before us.

Mr. WILEY. No; but let me finish my statement.

Mr. TYDINGS. Certainly.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I desire to say that the people of the country are not looking for us to do a piece of penny-ante business here. They want us to do something worth while. The $150,000,000 we talk about is not a drop in the bucket, as the Senator has suggested. He has been doing a great job here in the past few weeks in calling the attention of the country to the need for retrenchment.

I understood——

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I yield for a question, but I do not want to take much time now.

Mr. WILEY. I understood that we were not going to adjourn, and that a real bill was going to be worked out which would include retrenchment along the whole line as well as additional taxes.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me say that I myself have sensed every emotion that I have heard uttered on this floor. I have kept quiet about some of them, but I have sensed the pity and the sadness and the regret over recent tragic occurrences which I know are felt all over parts of Europe tonight. I have been absolutely astounded, however, by what it is proposed that we shall do to guard against similar tragedies in this country: "We need clouds of planes. We must have a navy second to none. We must have a navy in each ocean. Japan and Russia and Italy and Germany may combine against us. We need planes, diving Stukas. London will starve," and what not. What good are all those words without the money in the Treasury of the United States to back them up? That is the first line of defense; for without money, at least in a democracy, it is impossible to provide defense. We have not the money, and we are not even ready to tax the American people enough to pay for our everyday, routine, ordinary expenditures of government, without a cent going for the Army and the Navy for the past 10 years.

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. GUFFEY. If my memory correctly serves me, yesterday the Senator from Maryland voted against increasing the revenue from blended and rectified liquors. Is that correct?

Mr. TYDINGS. How much was involved?

Mr. GUFFEY. Four or five million dollars; and today the Senator wants to take it out of the officeholders.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me say to the Senator that I do not have to vote for every tax that every damn fool brings in here. [Laughter.]

Mr. GUFFEY. No; but the Senator ought to vote for pure liquor.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; but let me say to the Senator that if his mentality is such that he feels that any tax suggested should be swallowed without any criticism, he ought not to be in this body. Let me furthermore say to the Senator that a great many people are likely to miss the boat on these reductions. The people of the country know that we have been making large expenditures. They know that we have borrowed against the future. They know that we are now faced with a great emergency, and they are expecting Congress to act, to do the things it can do.

We cannot make guns. We cannot provide trucks. We cannot make planes. We cannot build battleships. There are things we can do, however, and ought to do, before we criticize the "fifth column" or anybody else in this Nation; and one of them is that we ought to pay for the peacetime expenditures of the Government before we go home, or none of us ought to come back here any more.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland whether his proposal is so drawn that the proceeds of this tax will be earmarked for the national defense.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, that is a sham and a delusion, for this reason: What is the use of having two deficits? If we earmark this tax for defense expenditures it will only pay a part of them, and we shall have a national-defense expenditure deficit in one set of books, and we shall have another deficit for the routine expenditures of the regular Government in another set of books. All we shall do will be to have two deficits instead of one.

This bill will not pay for national defense. It will not even pay for the ordinary peacetime routine expenses of the Government for a single year since June 30, 1930, down to this very second.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to call attention to the fact that it was in evidence from the Treasury Department officials that if we were entirely to transfer every item of expenditure—not only the extraordinary expenditures which have been authorized in the past 2 or 3 weeks, but every penny of the ordinary expenditures of the Government for military and naval support—to an entirely separate budget, and enact this bill, there would still be left a deficit of $1,090,000,000 in the ordinary civil expenditures of the Government.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, for four Mondays, with charts on the wall, with figures from the Treasury Department, with letters that high [indicating], this state of affairs has been shown.

The average annual expenditures for the past 10 years have been $7,300,000,000. The average annual receipts for the past 10 years have been $4,600,000,000. That is, for each and every one of the past 10 years we have spent $2,700,000,000 that we did not have. The average annual expenditures for the Army and the Navy together have been $1,100,000,000 for each of the past 10 years. So, if we subtract all of the average annual expenditures for the Army and Navy from the average annual deficit for each of the past 10 years, we have $1,600,000,000 of every-day, routine, ordinary expenses that we have not provided for a single year since 1930, without providing a single cent for the Army and Navy; and no one on this floor will dispute those figures. If there is anyone who wants to dispute them, let him rise.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. I was wondering if we could not bring this debate to a close.

Mr. TYDINGS. No; I will not yield for that purpose now, I will say to my good friend the Senator from Mississippi, but I shall not be long. I want to finish what I have on my mind and get it out.

Mr. HARRISON. Let me say what I was about to say.

Mr. TYDINGS. I would rather the Senator would not, unless he wants me to talk longer than I had expected to talk.

Mr. HARRISON. No; I do not want the Senator to do that.

Mr. TYDINGS. What I want to know is, are we confronted with an emergency or are we not? Do we need a bigger Navy? Do we need a bigger Army? Is there danger that we may be invaded? Do we need 100,000 or 50,000 planes? Do we need to take our boys and send them up in the air at the risk of their lives? What are we doing here, Members of the great Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in the midst of all this so-called emergency, in the midst of inducing young men to go aloft and risk their lives, preparing them for war, if we will not even provide for the ordinary, routine, peacetime expenditures of the Government? And we are going home to be elected on that platform. Wait until the people talk. I live a little closer to my constituents than many gentlemen in Congress do. You are not fooling anyone by this. The people of this country know that Congress is lying down on the job. They are not doing their part. They are talking a hell of a lot, but not performing very much.

Perhaps men will go out, if some of these dire predictions come true, to die, that is all, just to die, to drop from a height of 1, 2, or 3 miles, with blood streaming from their hearts, just conscious enough to know they have but a few seconds left to live and to utter a little prayer before the crash comes. Men are now going down in submarines; they are out on patrol in the storms, in old destroyers which have been reconditioned, far out at sea. Others are tense in other positions of national defense. We are debating how we can get enough men to bring our Army up to 400,000.

Mr. WALSH. I suggest to the Senator not to forget to include the fact that nearly all these men in submarines and airplanes are getting from $21 to $30 a month.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes, from $21 to $30 a month, and the men we will draft when we get into an emergency will serve for a dollar a day, and they will march forward at the command of their officers, or the generals, or the G. H. Q. They will march forward perhaps with the shells exploding all around them, and perhaps with comrades to the right and left dying.

I do not say these things will happen, and no one hopes more than I do that they will not happen. But the world today is not the world of 6 months ago, or a year ago, or 2 years ago, and have we not enough examples of procrastination, of the evils of democratic government, of the lack of leadership in the drama, the bloody story that is now having its final chapter written on the fields of France, and is now about to be written all over again on the islands of Great Britain?

Too late! Too late! Wait! Let us get elected!

There would have been no German Army if the generals had had their way. The generals wanted to march into the Rhineland, but the Premier of France, who was a Senator and up for reelection, told his generals not to march. It was not a popular issue.

There is no emergency? I am very glad that we can inform the people of the United States that the Congress thinks the emergency is so minor that it is not necessary even to pay as we go for the routine expenses of the Government.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the able Senator be kind enough to permit me in all humility to suggest to him that he withdraw the phrase "the evils of democracy," and say instead "The vice of those who champion a democratic form of government is that they frequently talk of their privileges but seldom of their duties?" Will the Senator accept that?

Mr. TYDINGS. I will, and I think it is a gem, because that is what men always do in a democracy, insist on their privileges and shrink from their duties; and they are not all out of Congress, if I may be permitted to judge by recent observations and results.

If there is no emergency, if there is nothing to worry about, if we do not have to economize, if there is no limit to the debt, if people want all of this national defense for nothing, then why bother our heads about it? But we cannot bring ourselves to realize that right here and now, day by day, we are leaving the financial "Maginot line" of the United States unfortified even while we yet have time to fortify it.

There is no use of my talking further. I am sorry my language was a little strong in one or two places, but I think the circumstances perhaps warranted it being a little out of the ordinary. Certainly we either have an emergency or we have not, and while I do not mean to convey this as a threat—it is not delivered for that purpose—I have a feeling that if we go away from this Capitol without providing the revenue at least to pay for our peacetime expenditures, outside of anything for the Army and the Navy, there is going to be more trouble for a good many men than they can visualize at this long distance.

If I may have one moment more, I will yield the floor. As I suggest, the amendment will read as follows, and this is a substitute for the pending amendment:

SEC. 403. The President is hereby authorized and directed to reduce appropriations for the executive branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941 (except appropriations for national defense, fixed charges, and trust funds), in such manner that the total amount of such reductions shall not be less than 3 percent of the total amount of the appropriation affected. Such reductions in appropriations shall be impounded and returned to the Treasury.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I stated earlier in the afternoon that this provision giving power to effect a total of 10 percent in reductions in all appropriations, total appropriations, would make it possible for the Bureau of the Budget to rewrite appropriation bills, and would make it possible to withhold public funds to the extent of 100 percent of the funds appropriated. I am not saying that the Budget would do that, but here is a theory of legislation which, to me, is repugnant. It is a delegation of power from the legislature to the executive and the Budget Bureau, which is a part of the executive department, that is worthy of the kind of governments which men are dying to destroy.

The Senator from Virginia is to be commended for his drive for economy, as is the Senator from Maryland. A reduction of 10 percent, if it can be accomplished by some other method, is to be commended, and I will vote for it, if in this emergency no other way can be found than to do it through this method of a delegation of power of this character. We may have to vote for it, although I think it is a repudiation of the things against which we are arming to defend our country.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I hesitate to take any time of the Senate at this moment, but I feel that I would be negligent in my duty to the Senate if I did not at least take note, in disapproval, of some of the remarks made by my good friend the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS].

I do not believe it is incumbent upon any Member of this body from any State to announce in advance that any Member of this body from any other State is unworthy of being returned here if he does not cast votes which happen to coincide with the views of Senators from other States.

The Senator from Maryland has announced that Congress has lain down on the job. I deny that. I deny that it is lying down on the job now. Congress has responded to every request made by the executive department for money and authority to prepare this Nation for its defense. So far as I know, and so far as any of us know, Congress has responded and is responding now to every demand of the American people for authority and money to prepare for our national defense.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield for a question.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator think that Congress has responded to the obvious need for increasing the manpower of the Army?

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, well, I do not intend to enter into a discussion of the size of the Army; but I think Congress has up to now responded, so far as we can see into the future, and so far as the War Department and the other departments, and those who are in charge of that matter, have requested. I do not care to get into a debate on the size of the Army, but I insist that Congress has responded and is now responding in a magnificent way, and in a way which I think has the approval of the American people in this great emergency.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator——

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not yield any further on that subject.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator made a statement.

Mr. BARKLEY. I know I did, and I will make a few more. I am willing to vote for increased taxes. Not only shall I vote for the billion dollars and more to be raised under this bill, but I shall vote for a $300,000,000 or $400,000,000 increase in revenue, and I may go as high as five hundred million. But no Senator, including the Senator from Maryland, has offered to raise the revenue to that figure.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, the Senator is wrong in that statement. I took the floor and offered an amendment providing for an increase of $400,000,000, but the Senator from Kentucky, who is a member of the Finance Committee, has not offered an amendment providing for an increase of a single cent, and he is the leader of the majority in the Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Kentucky has not offered an amendment for an increase of a single cent and has not any in contemplation.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator should not say that I have not offered any amendment calling for an increase in taxes, because I have.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator has. I apologize to him.

Mr. TYDINGS. I accept the apology.

Mr. BARKLEY. I was not aware that he had offered an amendment on the Senate floor. If he has, we will pass on it when we come to it. But suppose we can save $150,000,000 by this direction and command to the President of the United States to reduce even 3 percent; from what source is it to come? Does anyone know? Not only must we build guns, and tanks, and airplanes, and provide munitions, but in our preparation for the defense of our country we cannot ignore the spiritual and the moral equations which enter into the preparation of a nation to defend its institutions.

The amount of money to be saved here, $150,000,000, will be covered back into the Treasury. Not a dime of it will go into airplanes or into tanks or into munitions, unless Congress hereafter appropriates that money and directs that it shall be expended for that purpose. The President of the United States has not asked us to do it. The War Department has not asked us to do it. The Navy Department has not asked us to do it. The Appropriations Committee has not asked us to do it, nor has the Naval Affairs Committee or the Military Affairs Committee asked us to do it.

I am unwilling to make a gesture here toward preparedness for the defense of our country by saying to the unfortunate men and women who today rely upon a generous Government for the means of making an honest living, "We will build more airplanes and more tanks and more rifles by taking food out of your mouths and clothes off your backs and shelters from over your bodies."

I am not willing to say to our Nation and to those who are working for it, "We are willing to build navies and armies and airplanes and munitions of war and tanks of all sorts by reducing your salary and taking out of the pittance you are now drawing some of that which is so necessary in order that you may keep body and soul alive."

I am willing to vote for every appropriation necessary to fill the skies with airplanes, to cover the ground with tanks, to fill the ocean with ships, if necessary, but I want to do it by taking the revenue from those who are able to pay it, from those who are able to bear the burden, and not press down more unjustly upon those who are the unfortunate part of our people.

We cannot save 10 percent, we cannot save 5 percent, we cannot even save 3 percent, as proposed by the Senator from Maryland, without taking the larger part of it from these to whom I have referred.

My objection to the amendment is the same as my objection to the other amendment the Senator from Maryland offered awhile ago. It is the same objection I have had to the 10-percent amendment which was suggested originally by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. President, we have appropriated this money. If it should not have been appropriated when the measures were passed by the Senate, we should have reduced the amounts here on the floor of the Senate. We should have had the intelligence and the courage to reduce them when the bills were before us. The agricultural appropriation bill, the legislative appropriation bill, the Interior Department bill—all these appropriations came before us separately in bills reported by the Committee on Appropriations. We did not reduce the amounts carried in those measures, but on the whole we increased them by some slight additions on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. BYRD. The Senator from Kentucky objects to giving the President the power to reduce these appropriations. Will the Senator accept an amendment directing the Appropriations Committee to reduce the appropriations made for non-defense purposes by 10 percent?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will meet that situation when it arises.

Mr. BYRD. The Senator will have a chance to meet it when I offer the amendment to the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will meet it in the way that appeals to my judgment when the time comes to act upon it. I am not going to foreclose myself by saying that I shall vote to instruct the Appropriations Committee to make a horizontal reduction of 10 percent, which was what the Senator from Virginia wanted when he suggested the amendment to the bill.

Mr. BYRD. Will the Senator again yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. BYRD. Will the Democratic leader of the Senate suggest how he will reduce the appropriations and divert them to the purposes of national defense?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will cross that bridge when I come to it. I have no blueprint by which I can say how much I would reduce the appropriations if I had authority to do so.

Mr. BYRD. The Senator passes on every suggestion that is made for reductions.

Mr. BARKLEY. I pass on the suggestions according to the way they appeal to my judgment, and the suggestion made by the Senator from Virginia, for whom I have the greatest respect and admiration, as he knows, does not appeal to my judgment.

I am not speaking simply because I am the majority leader; I would make the same speech if I did not occupy the position in which I am honored by my colleagues here. If we were not satisfied with the appropriations which have been made, if we thought they should not have been made—and they have been before us during the last 3 or 4 weeks one at a time, and we have considered them item by item in the Senate of the United States—when they were under consideration we should have had the courage to reduce them. We have passed the bills, and most of them have been sent to the President. It is now proposed that we shall say to the President, "We command you to do what we did not have sense or courage enough to do ourselves—reduce these appropriations by 3 percent. or 5 percent, or 10 percent."

Mr. President, not an airplane will be built, not a tank will be constructed, not a single rifle will be made or used, because of the adoption of the proposed amendment. Whenever Congress is asked to appropriate more money or raise more revenue, I shall be ready to perform my duty, but I do not believe that after we have done our duty as we have seen fit to do it, we should be asked to direct the President to undo what we have done and that if we fail to do so, we should be considered to be unworthy and lying down on the job.

Mr. President, I am opposed to the amendment for the same reasons which led me to oppose the previous amendments, and I hope that in the Senator's discussion of this important subject—I realize his sincerity in discussing it; I realize the intelligent grasp he has of it—he will not take it upon himself to condemn the Congress of the United States as unworthy, and hold before it a sort of mirage of an election or of a defeat at the polls in order that we may be induced to vote one way or the other. I am, to the fullest extent of which I am capable of doing so, trying to forget the election in November. This is not a partisan matter. It makes no difference whether anyone is returned to the United States Senate or not. I am unwilling that this body should be condemned by wholesale to oblivion or to obloquy in the eyes of the people of the United States simply because all of us do not happen to agree with some other Member of the Senate with respect to the performance of our duty.

Mr. President, I have faith in the Senate of the United States. I have faith in the House of Representatives. I have faith in the Congress as a whole. I have faith in the President of the United States—unbounded and unlimited faith. I have faith in our Government. No matter how much we may differ with respect to details, our Government will survive, our democracy will survive; it will march on, and it will hold aloft the light to the other nations of the world, as it has done for a century and a half, in spite of the dark clouds which appear on the horizon and now lower over us.

Let us do our duty as we see it, with the wisdom that Almighty God bestows upon us. Let us do our duty each day as we see it, and let us forget what may happen in November, or in some other election year which we may face in the future.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I will try not to detain the Senate much longer, because I realize the hour is late.

I would be less than sincere, and I say this with no personal reflection upon anyone, if I did not reiterate my view, namely, that the Congress of the United States, at least as I see it, for whatever that is worth, does not seem to be measuring up to the grim responsibilities of this hour.

Let me for a moment, in the best of faith, show the hypocrisy of this tax bill. Normally, the Government takes in about $6,000,000,000 a year. Of that amount, all the corporations in the country and all the income-tax payers in the country contribute roughly about $2,500,000,000 together. Where does the other $3,500,000,000 come from? Does it come from the corporations? No. Does it come from the income-tax payers? No. It comes out of the sweat and toil of the poor people of whom the Senator spoke when he said he did not want to take the clothes off their backs, the roofs from over their heads, and the bread out of their mouths. There is no surer way to do that than by unnecessary taxation.

Only the other day I called attention to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the year 1937. In that year the cost of Government, local, State, and Federal, was $18,000,000,000. How much was the income? About $60,000,000,000. Nearly 30 percent, or, as the Senator from Massachusetts said, nearly $1 out of every three, goes into the treasuries of the various governments in order to meet the tax bill.

Who pays the major part of our Federal receipts? The rich, and the corporations? Oh, no. The major part of the money we collect in taxes comes out of the toil of every cotton farmer, every tobacco farmer, every coal miner, and every driver of a truck. The poor of this Nation pay the major part of the taxes.

What have we done in the present bill in the interest of the poor? We have put excise tax on top of excise tax. We have raised the gasoline tax from a cent to a cent and a half. We have raised the amusement taxes and various other taxes. I am not here criticizing those taxes. I see that they are necessary, because in our good years we would not face the inevitable thing which is now coming on us by leaps and bounds. Taxation is the cruelest way to take the roof from over the head of a poor man, or the clothes from his back, or the food from his mouth. It cuts down his consuming power. It takes from him money which he has earned.

Let me illustrate with a mere package of cigarettes, such as are smoked by nearly every workingman in the country. The little revenue stamp represents a tax of 6 cents collected by the Government of the United States. Let us assume that the average man smokes nearly a package a day, or 300 packages a year. Three hundred times 6 cents is $18. If the man is a carpenter making $4.50 a day he must go out and work 4 long days out of the year, not for bread for his family, not for a roof over his family's head, not for clothing for his family, but to pay the Federal Government his cigarette tax for that year.

What are we doing? Are we making it less probable that he will have to pay more? No; we are not even attempting in this grim emergency to pay the cost of our routine expenditures of government, without a dollar going for the Army or Navy, past, present, or future. In the face of that situation, and without meaning to reflect on any one, as I see it, Congress is not meeting its responsibilities. I do not believe the country thinks it is meeting its responsibilities, and I reiterate that I do not think it is meeting its responsibilites. Whoever does not like that statement will have to put up with it.

Yes; let us take all the money from the well-to-do. Let us take every cent of income from every person who has an income of $100,000 a year or more. How much would we get? If we were to take it all we should get $960,000,000, which is not one-tenth of what we have spent in each of the past 2 years. All we are doing is reducing wages by accumulating debt which will have to be paid for not by the rich, because there are not enough of them, but by the toil of the poor people of the country. It cannot be said that we are taking care of the poor when we do not eliminate every possible cent of expense.

Who pays the salary of a Senator? Who pays the salary of the President, and the salaries of all the other officials of the Government? Every coal miner in Pennsylvania, every fisherman in Maine, every farmer in Kansas. Those are the types of people who are paying the major part of the taxes of the Government.

With Hitler on one doorstep and Mussolini on the other, with all sorts of possible combinations of nations, with billions of dollars of new expenditures, with the Army increased, with the Navy increased, with talk of universal military training, the Congress of the United States intended to adjourn next Saturday, and go home and stay there for the rest of the year! Is not that true? Was not the Congress going home next Saturday?

If this emergency is one-hundredth as great as it has been represented to be, what Senator will rise on this floor and say that the Congress ought to go home for 6 months? I reiterate that Congress is not meeting the issue of this dark hour.

I know that the same thing happened in France. The same thing happened in Great Britain. Men talked of democracy. They talked of the priceless heritage they had. They tried to keep democracy alive with words instead of deeds. Democracy cannot live on words, any more than a human being can live on them. Democracy lives on bread; and the kind of bread it must bake is sometimes the bread of hardship, to prevent starvation.

I therefore feel, Mr. President, that we have a tremendously grave responsibility, and a scroll of unfinished work which is very long indeed. The whole tax structure ought to be revised from top to bottom. We ought to put our financial affairs in the best possible shape. The Treasury of the United States is our first line of national defense. We should all do our part, bear our share of the load, and then, when the enemy comes, we shall be ready to receive him in the manner in which we want him to be received.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, some of us who voted against the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia and the substitute offered by the Senator from Maryland were prompted to do so because the amendment brought in by the committee in the first place and the amendment now offered by the Senator from Maryland represent a surrender of the legislative power. They give us no assurance whatever as to where the proposed cut will fall. If we were to adopt this amendment we should be voting blindly, without being able to report to our constituents where the reduction is to be made, and who will have to bear it.

It seems to me clear that at a time when all of us must be aware of the deficiencies of democracy, we cannot urge the failure of democracy as supporting a proposal to transfer from the legislative branch of the Government its fundamental power of expenditure. If there is any element whatever that characterizes the democratic form of government, it is that the representatives of the people, elected by the people, are the ones who shall say where the expenditures shall be made, for what purposes they shall be made, and by whom and in what form the taxes shall be levied.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am sorry the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] has left the floor, because I was about to ask him to consent to a substitute for the amendment he has offered. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. Would the Senator support an amendment directing the Appropriations Committee——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let me say to the Senator from Virginia that I have in my hand an amendment which I should like to offer as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland, and which of course would also be a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Virginia. Let me read it. It is based upon my conception that it is the legislative duty to make appropriations; that the House and the Senate have committees which have been appointed for the purpose of making appropriations and levying taxes. I am a member of the Appropriations Committee, and as a member of that committee I desire to say that I have attended the meetings of the Appropriations Committee, and I am able to testify that the great majority of the members appointed on that committee have diligently attempted to render efficient service. As a member of that committee I can testify that bill after bill has been brought upon this floor by the committee, and then its items have been increased on the floor. Let no one intimate that the Committee on Appropriations has not been diligent about its work. Let no one spread abroad through the United States the charge that at least that committee of the Senate has not endeavored to do its duty.

The amendment which I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland to accept as a substitute for his amendment—and I make this request because it would be out of order as an amendment in the third degree at the moment—reads as follows:

The Committees on Appropriations of the Senate and the House of Representatives are hereby directed to review the appropriation bills for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and to report such amendments thereto as will effect a total reduction of $500,000,000 in the civil expenses of the Government.

Let me say that such an amendment will not be an abdication of legislative authority and duty. It will not be a shedding of responsibility. If we are sincerely inclined to make an effort to reduce the civil expenditures of the Government, the proper way to do it is for the Congress of the United States to do it through its committees appointed for the purpose.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator is a member of the Appropriations Committee. I do not recall whether or not the Senator is a member of the subcommittee having to do with agriculture. I know he is a member of the subcommittee having to do with Interior Department appropriations. Does the Senator believe that in the time between now and the first of July, the first of the fiscal year, it would be at all possible so to review those appropriations as to change them?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No; I do not think it would be possible to do it between now and the first of July.

Mr. McCARRAN. My understanding is that the amendment is applicable to the next fiscal year.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly; but the appropriations are made for the full 12 months, and I know no reason why the Congress of the United States could not pass a bill next month, or 2 months hence, reducing the expenditures for the fiscal year.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is, to have the Appropriations Committee hold hearings for a year hence?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Not at all; for this fiscal year. The Congress of the United States could pass in order a bill which would reduce the appropriations remaining to be expended by the Department of Agriculture, let us say, or the Department of the Interior, during the fiscal year 1941.

Mr. McCARRAN. What would the Senator do with the commitments which must be made at the opening of the fiscal year?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The committee would pass upon them. The committee would find its opportunity to do it; and the committee could do this just as well as the Executive could do it under the provision offered by the Senator.

Mr. McCARRAN. I agree with the last statement.

Mr. BYRNES, Mr. TYDINGS, and Mr. CLARK of Missouri addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HILL in the chair). Does the Senator from Wyoming yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I asked the Senator to yield in order that I might inquire of the chairman of the Finance Committee whether he intends to have the Senate remain in session much longer, because if the Senator from Wyoming should insist upon his amendment I should feel called upon to make a statement on the subject, much as I dislike to do so. I suggest that as it is now 6:30 o'clock, if we should take a recess now until tomorrow, in the calm consideration of the morning we might possibly be able to reach some agreement. It is evident that there will be considerable debate upon this question.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, this is the only remaining provision in the Senate committee recommendations. I was hoping we could finish the measure tonight; but I appreciate that the Senate has been in session since 11 o'clock this morning. If this subject is going to create a prolonged discussion, I have no objection to our taking a recess now until tomorrow. I hope we may meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow, however.

I should like to have Senators understand that we will try to conclude the consideration of the tax bill tomorrow. Generous as Senators are with their speeches, I hope they will be generous enough to remain tomorrow until we can complete the consideration of the bill.

JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Mr. PEPPER introduced a joint resolution (S. J. Res. 280) to confer upon the President full wartime powers to prepare and defend America, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REVENUE BILL OF 1940—AMENDMENTS

Mr. MEAD, Mr. McKELLAR, and Mr. O'MAHONEY each submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the bill (H. R. 10039) to provide for the expenses of national preparedness by raising revenue and issuing bonds, to provide a method for paying for such bonds, and for other purposes, which were severally ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. BAILEY, from the Committee on Commerce, reported favorably the nominations of several officers for promotion in the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

Mr. BAILEY also, from the Committee on Commerce, reported favorably the following nominations in the Coast Guard:

Commander James Pine to be a captain, to rank as such from May 25, 1940;

Arthur E. Larsen, to be a chief boatswain; and Harry F. Bradley, to be a chief machinist.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported favorably the nominations of several meritorious noncommissioned officers to be second lieutenants in the Marine Corps from the 20th day of June, 1940; and also the nominations of sundry citizens to be second lieutenants in the Marine Corps from the 25th day of June, 1940.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HILL in the chair). If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the nominations on the Executive Calendar.

THE JUDICIARY

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Webster J. Oliver to be judge of the United States Customs Court.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of John C. Lehr to be United States attorney for the eastern district of Michigan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Otto F. Heine to be United States marshal for the district of Hawaii.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

That concludes the calendar.

RECESS

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. ADAMS. I wish to state to the Senator from Kentucky that the full Committee on Appropriations will meet tomorrow morning at 11:30 to take up the supplemental military and naval bill. There will be 23 or 24 Senators in attendance, and I hope the Senator will not ask that the Senate meet tomorrow at 11 o'clock.

Mr. BARKLEY. I was about to move that the Senate adjourn until 11 o'clock tomorrow, but in view of what the Senator from Colorado has stated, as well as for other reasons, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Wednesday, June 19, 1940, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate June 18 (legislative day of May 28), 1940

UNITED STATES CUSTOMS COURT

Webster J. Oliver to be judge of the United States Customs Court.

UNITED STATES ATTORNEY

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, JUNE 18, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Hear Thou our prayer, O Lord, from Thy dwelling place, even from heaven; and when Thou hearest, forgive: Thine, O Lord, is the greatness and the power and the glory and the majesty. Now, therefore, we thank Thee and praise Thy glorious name. Heavenly Father, the hour is dark, the peril is great; may the dawn soon come; lead us into that quietness and hopefulness which are the strength of life. O King eternal, the wings of the brave, defending eagle have drooped and he can no longer battle with the storm; his heart is tired and fainting, but is undaunted still. A people that so long glowed with passions of right and justice is helpless and now contemplates its problems on the cruel anvil of defeat. O God of mercy, while the chivalrous soldier and the broken-hearted homeless, mocked by their melting hopes, die without realizing their tantalizing visions of home and rest, oh, grant that their enrichment may be fully realized in an everlasting inheritance. Through these perilous and arduous days, be Thou the constant guide and support of our President. By quiet thought, quiet duty, quiet energy, and by quiet prayer, steel upon us as a people and arm us to crusade for the redemption of man. In the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 9117. An act to eliminate the tax on brandy and wine spirits used in the fortification of wine; to increase the tax on wine; to compensate for the loss of revenue occasioned by the elimination of the tax on brandy and wine spirits used in the fortification of wine; and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. J. Res. 271. Joint resolution approving nonrecognition of the transfer of any geographic region in the Western Hemisphere from one non-American power to another non-American power, and providing for consultation with other American republics in the event that such transfer should appear likely.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CROWE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and to include therein a clipping from the Washington Evening Star.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

ADDITIONAL CLERICAL SERVICES IN THE ENROLLING ROOM

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 532

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives during the remainder of the present session not exceeding $200 for additional clerical services in the enrolling room.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADDITIONAL COMPENSATION FOR CERTAIN EMPLOYEES OF THE HOUSE

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a further privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 533

Resolved, That commencing July 1, 1940, the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, until otherwise provided by law, additional compensation per annum, payable monthly, to certain employees of the House, as follows:

To the Assistant Parliamentarian the sum of $240; and $750 so long as the position is held by the present incumbent to be in addition to that now provided by law during the present incumbency;

To the messenger to Speaker's table, $660 so long as the position is held by the present incumbent;

To the stenographer and typewriter, in the office of the Sergeant at Arms, the sum of $700.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a further privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 531

Resolved, That, effective July 1, 1940, there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, until otherwise provided by law, compensation at the rate of $2,460 per annum for the services of an assistant clerk to the Committee on Claims. Such employment shall be in lieu of an assistant clerk to said committee at the rate of $1,740, as provided in the Legislative Branch Appropriation Act, 1941.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out, in line 1, the words "July 1, 1940" and substitute the words "January 1, 1941."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a column appearing in last night's Star.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Utah?

There was no objection.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I have two unanimous-consent requests.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech I made at the world's fair on June 16, on Father's Day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I also ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including a speech I made at the Astor Hotel, before the Non-Sectarian Anti-Nazi League, to champion human rights, with certain excerpts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one-half minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from California [Mr. GEYER] has for several months, through his extensions of remarks in the RECORD, been attacking certain States of the South because of the poll tax. He paid his respects to Mississippi on yesterday. The gentleman reminds me, Mr. Speaker, of what Mr. Disraeli once said of Mr. Kremlin, "He is distinguished for his ignorance, for he has but one idea and that is wrong." [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am holding in my hand the Congressional Directory. On pages 496 and 497, under Foreign Service of the United States, you will find the names of the United States personnel assigned to Germany. It lists 72 major officeholders. Included in this list are the names of a lieutenant colonel and two majors of the United States Army as military attachés. Also are listed two commanders, two lieutenant commanders, and two lieutenants of the United States Navy, as naval attachés.

In the light of events it is pertinent to ask, and the American people are entitled to know, whether these official and technically trained representatives were either unaware of what Hitler has been doing for the past few years, or knowing, were derelict in reporting the facts to this Government. Knowing the efficiency and devotion of these representatives, I do not believe they were derelict in their duty. It must be that the President of the United States and his advisers were made cognizant of the threatening situation. This being true the administration cannot escape responsibility for the presently admitted woefully unprepared condition of this country. If the President did not know, then he retains advisers which events have convicted as incompetent. If he did know, then he has lulled the country into a false and dangerous content and failed through a false political expediency to exhibit that degree of courage the people of the United States have a right to demand of a President in these hours of world peril. [Applause.]

SITTING OF NAVAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE DURING SESSIONS OF HOUSE

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Naval Affairs may be permitted to sit during the sessions of the House today and tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio address delivered by me.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDWIN A. HALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a recent editorial from the Oneonta News.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an editorial written by the American Legion commander, Mr. Raymond J. Kelly.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include an editorial from the New York Herald Tribune, and quotations from Washington newspapers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include several letters from constituents and residents of Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

AMERICAN SCHOOL ARMY

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I have just introduced a bill to establish and maintain an American school army, and to organize and equip an American reserve army. I am taking this opportunity particularly to call the attention of the Members of the House to the bill, because it will not only in no way interfere with our present program for immediate preparedness, but this is the idea that Woodrow Wilson referred to as the long look ahead for American preparedness. At a later date I shall discuss the matter before the House.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

THE SESSION OF CONGRESS

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to extend in the Appendix of the RECORD a recent editorial from the Joplin News Herald.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, this morning I received the following telegram from Marshfield, Mo.:

Congressman DEWEY SHORT,
Washington, D. C.:

Webster County Post, No. 142, the American Legion, feels that Congress should remain in session during this emergency, which is greater now than when the Legion national convention made the request last fall.

BURLEY JUSTIS, Commander.

Mr. Speaker, this message merely voices the almost unanimous opinion of the American people. Naturally the Members of Congress want to adjourn and go home for a little vacation, to visit family and friends in the campaign for reelection, but public duty should come before personal pleasure in this crisis, and any Member of Congress who votes to adjourn to go home at this particular time should be allowed by the voters to remain home when they go to the polls this fall. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

CONDITION OF THE TREASURY

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, where are you going to get the money? When I take the Treasury statement of June 11 I find that we are $3,511,500,000 in the red. You are spending and spending and spending more and more—over $7,000 a minute in the red—and it seems to me to be a song that ought to be sung here by many Members of Congress, to stop the waste and extravagance of this Government. You are appropriating and appropriating more and more money, and nothing has been said by the administration about cutting down the regular operating expenses of the Government. Why not have an economically operated Government and not an extravagantly operated Government? If you continue on with this preparation of war, how are you going to maintain your battleships, and how are you going to maintain the Army, and how are you going to maintain your air force, if you have no money to operate them with? They will amount to nothing in the hands of this administration because you will have nothing with which to maintain them.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

HARRY BRIDGES

Mr. ROUTZOHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

[Mr. ROUTZOHN addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix of the RECORD.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

By unanimous consent, Mr. BENDER and Mr. SCHULTE were granted permission to extend their own remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and that I may be permitted to include certain brief excerpts.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include therein a radio address by Mr. Hibbin on the subject of the dairy-products industry.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SECREST. Mr. Speaker, on December 17, 1939, the Chesterfield monthly meeting of Friends was held at Chesterhill, Ohio. At that meeting these substantial and loyal Americans issued a statement which I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD as an extension of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and include a short article.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TRADE AGREEMENTS WITH SOUTH AMERICA

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, the President's proposal for an economic cartel to control the sale of the products of the American Continent is just another of the crackpot and cockeyed New Deal experiments.

If Germany and Italy win the war they will control all of continental Europe, with a population of over 250,000,000. These nations will trade with South American countries or any nations they want to on the best possible terms.

President Roosevelt must have succumbed to the war hysteria that he has helped to spread by his warlike speeches. Germany uses the barter system, not through choice but because she has no more gold or foreign exchange. This is true now of most European nations. President Roosevelt is largely responsible because of his fantastic New Deal folly of purchasing foreign gold at $35 an ounce, or at twice the cost of production. We now own 75 percent of the gold in the world, which serves no useful purpose, but interferes seriously with world trade.

The proposed American trade cartel will be another fiasco, like the gold-purchasing experiment. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include an address by Louis Johnson, Assistant Secretary of War, at Charlottesville, Va.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

SECOND DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 10104, Rept. No. 2597) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1940, and June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TABER reserved all points of order on the bill.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10104; and pending that, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill be limited to 45 minutes on each side, the time to be controlled one-half by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] and one-half by myself.

Mr. TABER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I think we should have an hour on a side.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I modify the request, Mr. Speaker, to make it 1 hour on a side.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10104, the second deficiency appropriation bill, with Mr. BLAND in the chair.

By unanimous consent the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, this is the second deficiency appropriation bill, the usual clean-up bill for emergency items that must be gotten in by July 1, the beginning of the next fiscal year.

The amount carried in the bill is $57,917,100.39, with authorizations aggregating $6,900,000, and the bill is $3,225,646.67 less than the Budget estimates.

The report and bill are available and contain a very full statement of the items in the bill, and unless there is some special item that some Member wishes to question me about,

I will let the debate proceed and wait until we come to the 5-minute rule.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, this bill calls for a total of about $57,900,000 and is brought in $2,225,000 below the Budget.

With the advent of this bill in the House and its prospective passage this afternoon the total appropriations made by this Congress, including permanent appropriations, aggregate approximately $15,369,000,000 made since this Congress convened the first of January. Some of these items are for things that we could get along without, and for projects that, in these times, we could do without.

There has been more of a spirit of striving to cut out useless and needless projects in connection with this bill than there has been in most of the others. I hope that spirit will continue and develop as we approach more serious problems in the days that are to come, because almost every dollar that we can rake and scrape together is going to be needed for national defense.

With reference to this bill there are only a few items that are of large size that have been given consideration that raise the appropriations above those carried in the regular bills. Amongst the most important of those are the ones for immigration and naturalization work. There we have carried an addition of $1,500,000 approximately for the immigration border patrol. With conditions such as they are almost no one would want to take the position that we should not carry this increased service at the present time. The border situation has developed to the point where our country is requiring passports from those coming in. This means a great deal more work and a great deal more accuracy, in that work.

There is a very considerable item for increased clerical and administrative help in the Naturalization Service. A tremendous number of people have decided that they wish to be naturalized now that world conditions are so upset. It is exceedingly important that none be admitted who are not fit to be admitted, and probably it is necessary that we dispose of these applications which have increased two- or three-fold in the last 6 months. I was talking last Friday with a New York City district judge who stated that he would have as high as 500 of these applicants coming before him in a single day.

Perhaps the most serious thing with which we have to contend is people within our own borders who need attention. I hope that when that bill which was reported to the House yesterday shall be passed by the House and the Senate that the F. B. I. will be able to take care and identify more of those who really should not be here, and keep track of them.

There will be but a few items of contest in the bill. I think those will be better left for consideration when they are reached in the reading of the bill. Almost all of the situation is deficiencies with the exception of the Immigration Service and a few items of that kind. There are one or two: There is the Alaska crab investigation, $100,000; there is the item for the transportation of gold. If we would stop the buying of gold, as we should, we would be rid of that difficulty and the need of transporting a lot of gold into the interior of the country. There are a few things of that kind where we could save money, if we set out to do so, and I hope that when there is an opportunity to do something of that kind we may be able to save a dollar.

In connection with what I say today I am going to place a statement in the RECORD, which I have prepared in the form of a table showing the appropriations for the different departments, the permanent appropriations so far this session, giving as far as I can an up-to-date picture and the latest figure with reference to each bill. It is rather difficult to keep up with them, and probably I might be a day behind on some of them and not be quite high enough, but I hope this table will be of help to the Members.

The following is the table:

Department and amount approved
Agriculture and Farm Credit	$922,911,213.00
Independent Offices	1,120,240,523.00
State	20,125,500.00
Justice	41,323,000.00
Judiciary	11,792,000.00
Treasury	218,752,000.00
Post Office	814,049,062.00
Navy	1,302,014,038.00
Interior	137,256,834.00
Civil Functions	223,636,517.00
Military	1,500,424,988.00
Labor-Federal Security	1,023,282,690.00
Legislative	23,707,520.00
Emergency supplemental (spent)	252,340,776.00
Urgent deficiency	57,541,300.00
First deficiency	92,035,408.00
Relief and work relief	1,111,754,916.00
Supplement to national defense	1,381,917,147.00
Second deficiency	57,917,100.39
Total	11,346,931,032.39
Permanent appropriations (mostly interest)	2,195,524,640.00
Trust funds	1,826,603,150.00
Grand total	15,369,058,822.39

NOTE.—The above figures are the amount of annual general fund appropriations contained in all bills except the District of Columbia. The District of Columbia bill amounts to $49,697,890 in its latest stage. Of the foregoing totals, trust funds appropriations of $2,195,524,640 and permanent and special fund appropriations of $1,826,603,150 are estimated by the Budget for appropriation in the fiscal year 1941.

I believe with this short statement I shall conclude my reference to the bill. At this stage of the legislative situation we still have pending the agricultural appropriation bill, the War Department civil functions appropriation bill, the Labor and Federal Security appropriation bills, the appropriation for the national-defense measure passed last week, the relief bill, and this deficiency bill. This makes a total of six appropriation bills that must be disposed of by legislative action before this Congress is ready to cease its labors for the time being for this session.

Let me say also that this bill marks the fifth bill of a deficiency type that has come before this Congress in this session. This is probably one of the highest records we have had.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON] such time as he may desire.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I think there will not be much controversy over the items in the appropriations bill which we are considering today, so I would like to take the liberty of speaking in a rather general way.

Our Nation today is facing one of the most difficult and critical eras in all its history. Our people realize, even as officials in Washington charged more directly with the responsibility of guiding the Nation through these perilous days realize, the graveness of our situation in relation to other nations of the world, so many of which are torn by the tragedy of war. Congress has been working almost day and night on the many problems of national defense, and I hope and trust that every Member of this House has placed the security of our Nation, and the preservation of those principles for which it has always stood, first in his consideration during these last weeks of great crisis. My own work as a member of the House Appropriations Committee and a member of the War Department subcommittee handling the problem of providing funds for the defense program and our heavy schedule here in the House itself have given me only meager time to reply to the hundreds of earnest letters and telegrams which I have received from friends throughout my district who are anxiously interested in some aspect of our defense program. The emergency demands that Members of Congress stay at their post of duty in Washington. I propose that we stay on the job and disregard all other considerations, political or personal. Our country comes first.

Although we have much cause for alarm, we have many reasons to rejoice. Indeed, there is something happening in America that ought to thrill the heart of everyone who loves his country. I refer to the growing spirit of patriotism among our people. On every hand there is evidence of a revival of the true spirit of Americanism. Those who had forgotten the flag and what it meant, and what it means, are reawakening to a new realization of its meaning. Those who have been indifferent when the flags and "isms" of other countries have been praised and advocated in this Nation now are proclaiming the rediscovered majesty of Old Glory. They see a new vigor in the red, the white, and the blue. In their hearts they are saying with the poet—

There's no other land like my land,
Beneath the shining sun.
There's no other flag like my flag
In all the world—not one.
One land, one tongue, one people!
To one flag, loyal, true,
No red shall wave o'er my fair land
Without the white and blue.

The new spirit of loyalty to our own country goes hand in hand with the determination among all true Americans that the enemy aliens, the followers of false and foreign isms, the so-called "fifth columnists," shall be uprooted and banished from the land. This rising tide of indignation toward people who live in this country but who are disloyal to our institutions is of the greatest significance and importance to our future.

Unfortunately, in the past in seeking to be tolerant, we have permitted the enemy within the gates to grow into what is now a serious threat to our stability as a Nation. Had we failed to recognize this danger from within, I can visualize the destruction of the morale of our people and the perpetuity of our Nation. But since we have recognized the problem and since our people are aroused over the issue, I have every confidence in our capacity to deal promptly, decisively, and effectively with the problem. Mr. Speaker, nothing short of complete annihilation of these enemies within the gates will suffice. I rejoice that the American people are alert to the dangers from within and that the Members of Congress are going forward with a program of action. The American people have always responded in the hour of emergency, and it is gratifying to know that they still rise in their might in the hour of need. To put it bluntly, our citizens will not tolerate the existence of a "fifth column" in this country.

A couple of years ago we created in the House of Representatives the so-called Dies committee and instructed this committee to investigate un-American activities. That committee has caught the imagination of the American people. The facts which have been brought out have been given wide publicity through the press, and it would be impossible to exaggerate the wholesome influences which have been generated by the committee. Upon about three occasions we have voted by an overwhelming majority to appropriate money for the continuation of the committee, and I am proud to have had a part in supporting a movement in Congress which has focused the attention of all America on the dangers which confront our country from within.

Just last week we provided 500 additional agents for the Federal Bureau of Investigation who are charged with the duty of assisting the Department of Justice and other agencies of the State and national governments in stamping out un-American activities. This increases the number of F. B. I. agents to about 1,500. In this bill we increase the personnel of our Immigration Service, particularly because of the situation along the Mexican border.

I advocate the immediate passage of pending legislation to fingerprint and investigate the activities of all aliens. Every enemy alien ought to be deported at once, our immigration laws must be strengthened, and every effort made, and made promptly, to remedy a situation which we all recognize as serious.

I believe the overwhelming majority of the people of this Nation are ready to support every official in the fight against this so-called "fifth column." I have called upon the Department of Justice to furnish the people information in order that the people may know how to cooperate with the officials of the Government in this campaign against those guilty of un-American activities. Already results are being achieved, but the real task is just beginning.

Only when we have annihilated our enemies from within will it be possible for us to have an effective national-defense program. Real national defense contemplates a program of unity at home and the speedy expansion of our Army, Navy, and Air Corps, correlated in such a way with all the instruments of national defense that the greatest effectiveness may be secured. Last year we appropriated more than a billion and a half dollars for national defense. This year we have already appropriated about $5,000,000,000.

In my judgment, there will be additional appropriations for national defense before the adjournment of this Congress. Every true American has cause to rejoice over the unity of our people—over the determination of our people that the national-defense program must and shall go forward speedily without red tape and indecision. So, in a world of trouble and danger there is yet cause for Americans to rejoice. The task before us is great, but success is ours if we are willing to pay the price in sacrifice and effort. There is every evidence that our people are measuring up to the demands of the hour. The prayer which Irving Berlin wrote in 1938 and which Kate Smith has made famous can well be the prayer today of all those who owe their allegiance to the Stars and Stripes.

God bless America,
Land that I love,
Stand beside her and guide her
Through the night with a light from above;
From the mountains, to the prairies,
To the oceans white with foam,
God bless America,
My home sweet home.

[Applause.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I believe I can move to strike out the last word when the bill is being considered under the 5-minute rule and discuss what I have in mind. I wanted to take up and discuss the appropriation for transportation of gold out to Fort Knox. This bill carries an appropriation in excess of $1,000,000 to transport $8,000,000,000 of gold.

Mr. STEFAN. It carries an appropriation of over a million and a half dollars. To be exact, it is $1,608,000. It is to go by mail.

Mr. FISH. An appropriation of a million and a half dollars to transport $8,000,000,000 worth of gold to be buried out in Fort Knox. I consider the purchase of gold at $35 an ounce, which is twice the cost of production, and when we buy it from Soviet Russia at three times the cost of production, to be the greatest of all New Deal fiascos and a senseless proposition to impoverish America and enrich foreign countries. But I prefer to let that discussion go over until the proper time.

At this time I desire to make certain observations. There was some discussion in the committee, I believe, about an appropriation of $1,000,000 to be placed in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wallace, in order to make an extensive survey of South America to ascertain the most available land on which to grow rubber. I am informed by the Secretary of Agriculture that there are 23,000,000 acres available on which to grow rubber in South America. This should have been done 30 years ago, but as a matter of national defense it ought to be done now. Even some of our leading columnists, such as Walter Lippmann, have indicated that we ought to go into the European war because we may be shut off from our rubber and tin supply. I do not believe we could spend a million dollars to better advantage for national defense, for the interest of our country, and for the employment of American labor than to turn a million dollars over to the Secretary of Agriculture to make an extensive survey to find out the best located land, the situation with reference to rainfall, and so forth, for the cultivation of rubber in South America.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. I may say to the gentleman that the committee cut out that item.

Mr. FISH. That is what I heard this morning, and I am very sorry they did it. If it is in order to put it back in the bill, and if it is germane to the bill, I propose to offer it at the proper time. I would like to see an appropriation of a million dollars turned over to the Secretary of Agriculture who wants it and who believes that it would do more to solve our rubber problem than anything else. In addition to that, and to show that I am willing to cooperate with Democratic Cabinet members in the public interest, I would like to see an appropriation of another million dollars to be made available to the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Ickes, to build a smelter for tin somewhere along the Atlantic coast.

We are informed by Mr. Lippmann that we must go to war for tin and rubber, that we cannot get tin or rubber anywhere else except in the Far East, and that we are defenseless without it. You can buy all the tin you want in Bolivia, but we have no smelter or no refinery in America to refine the tin ore. We must buy our tin from England or from Holland. They have a monopoly and we pay through the nose. We are the greatest consumer of tin in the world. We consume something like 60 percent of all the tin and 60 to 65 percent of all the rubber. So these appropriations of a million dollars a piece would be worth while. They would be constructive and save us money and they would be along the lines of national defense, and would result in putting our own people to work.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I want to concur in the gentleman's statement with regard to the possibilities of producing rubber in this country—I mean in the continental United States. Plant life growing rubber can be grown in our four States bordering on Mexico. That proposition was explored 25 years ago. Thomas Edison found conclusively it could be done, and scientific men have also contended that rubber can be produced in this country. Why not give our surplus acres in a land of sunshine a chance to produce this necessity?

Mr. FISH. I think all the experts are agreed that rubber can be produced in South America. I am not an expert on rubber, but I am informed that rubber originally came from South America and was transported to the Far East.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. SHORT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHORT. I merely want to ask the gentleman why this plant or smelter should be built along the Atlantic seaboard? Does the gentleman not think it would be wise to build these airplane and munitions factories in the Middle West where they would not be so vulnerable to attack by an enemy as those that are located along the Atlantic and Pacific coasts?

Mr. FISH. I concur with the gentleman that airplane factories and munitions factories should be built back from the coast, but this has to do with refining a heavy ore that comes in from Bolivia by ship. It seems to me the practical and feasible way would be to have a smelter somewhere along the seacoast where the ships could come up to the factory and the tin refined there. Personally I would prefer to have it located in my district up the Hudson River and with the President's help I expect to get it there. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHORT. The gentleman will agree that factories which use lead and zinc should perhaps be located out where they produce the lead and zinc?

Mr. FISH. Yes; by the same token you should have those factories out there in the State of Missouri, that grand old State, where you produce the lead.

Mr. STEFAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, something has been said about the production of rubber. The gentleman from New York is very much interested in the development of rubber in South America. I would like to inform him that our colleague the gentleman from California [Mr. CARTER] made a desperate fight in committee to amend the bill so that we could do some experimenting in connection with the development of domestic rubber. The amendment was defeated in committee in spite of the hard fight made by our colleague from California. May I inform the gentleman that the committee went into that very thoroughly and decided it was not feasible because of the fact that synthetic rubber is being developed rapidly in America today and it is being developed very successfully.

Mr. FISH. I thank the gentleman. The fact is that the Standard Oil Co. of New York or New Jersey has built a million-dollar plant in which to make synthetic rubber and they expect to increase it year by year. It is also a fact that that synthetic rubber is just as good for general purposes as the natural or raw rubber; however, it costs a great deal more and many people feel if we could grow rubber in South America we can keep the cost down. We are the greatest consumers of rubber in the world. It would employ American labor here where the crude rubber would be refined and, furthermore, we would have this supply no matter what happened way over in the Far East. It seems to me my proposal makes sense and good sense. I am in entire accord with the request of the Secretary of Agriculture and I think the Congress ought to give him $1,000,000 to make this survey immediately, and also encourage private companies to make synthetic rubber in the United States. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentlewoman from Illinois [Miss SUMNER].

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I did not understand the gentleman was going to yield time to me, but I happen to know of my own personal knowledge that in either 1925 or 1926 leading private companies that were greatly interested in manufacturing tires cheaply did conduct a private survey and had all the finances necessary to conduct such a survey in South America, and they came to the reluctant conclusion that it would not be a success to make any such attempt to raise rubber there.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, this is another appropriation bill. Most all bills passed since January 3 have been appropriation bills. It seems to me, as a member of the Appropriations Committee, that when the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON], a few minutes ago, said that this is one of the hardest working committees in the House of Representatives, I wonder if he did not also mean that it is the hardest-worked committee. By that I mean that every Member of Congress and every department of the Government, and everybody in the United States wants the Appropriations Committee to give them everything they want. So where do we find ourselves? We find ourselves in a deplorable and terrible financial condition.

When we look at the statement made by Mr. Morgenthau, who has charge of the Treasury Department, we find that today we are over $3,500,000,000 in the red up to this time for the year that will close the 30th day of this month, and when we think of what is to come next year with respect to the appropriations that we have made and the fact that you have passed a tax bill that is going to yield $1,007,000,000 and with the estimated receipts, as given by the President of the United States in his message to Congress, of about $5,500,000,000, we will find next year that we will be in the red $5,500,000,000. That is terrible.

Now, with a tax bill of $1,007,000,000, you fellows have not hit beyond the surface, and you have not started to scratch. The American people do not know what you are doing and they will not know until you give them a tax bill of about $2,000,000,000 to $3,000,000,000 increase annually. They will then begin to realize what this Congress has done. They will begin to realize what this New Deal spending has been all about. Whenever their backs begin to break, whenever they begin to bulge, and whenever they begin to bend, they will find out they are in a terrible condition.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. GEYER of California. What would the gentleman think about an excess-profits tax to be placed on some of these people who are making all this money out of this preparedness program? Will the gentleman discuss that?

Mr. RICH. I do not know that anybody has made anything out of this preparedness program as yet. You have just got started, and if it had not been for this war scare and war hysteria that is going on, this administration would be on the flat of your backs and you would be down and out. You have 11,000,000 unemployed now, and you would have about 10,000,000 or 12,000,000 unemployed at least, because instead of going ahead with all this spending you have gone back and back, and you have been drifting down the river until, so far as I know, you would soon be out on the great ocean, and then you would certainly sink. That is what you are going to do. You are going to sink this Nation of ours financially, and nothing under God's Heaven is going to stop you.

Mr. GEYER of California. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. RICH. Yes; if the gentleman has something constructive.

Mr. GEYER of California. I think this is constructive.

Mr. RICH. I will have to take that chance.

Mr. GEYER of California. The gentleman would not go so far as to say there are not great profits to be made out of all this preparedness program, would he?

Mr. RICH. If anybody makes a great excessive profit, I will be the first one to vote to take it away from him.

Mr. GEYER of California. That is fine.

Mr. RICH. Because you have not seen me stand up here and holler for economy and try to cut down the appropriations and not vote for taxes. I believe in a balanced Budget. I have voted for these tax bills, as much as I disliked to do it, because a month ago I said you would have to have a tax bill. The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON], one of the finest men I ever knew in my life, came over to me and said, "Do you want a tax bill this year?" and I said, "Sure, you have got to get it now." They were not going to bring the tax bill in until they found that they could use the national emergency to bring in the tax bill in disguise. They would not venture to bring in a tax bill because of New Deal spending and squandering.

Then they brought in a bill, a tax bill, and tried to camouflage it by telling the people that this tax bill is for a national emergency. Good heavens! You have had 7 years now, and you are no better off today than 7 years ago, if you measure it by the unemployed.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Chairman, I compliment the gentleman from Pennsylvania on his saying that he is willing to tax the profits out of this war. I think that is a fine statement and I think it is consistent.

Mr. RICH. Oh, I try to be consistent all the way down the line in spending and taxing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. Yes; I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The gentleman should not be unduly alarmed, because a multimillionaire New Deal leader, James Cromwell, who is just as liberal as President Roosevelt in spending other people's money, made one of his senatorial campaign speeches in Atlantic City the other day. I refer to the Newark Evening News of June 15, 1940, which contains a report of this speech in which he denounced Members of Congress as Trojan jackasses, and either fools or knaves. Now if and when he is elected to the United States Senate, he ought to be able to correct the economic situation and save our country. The gentleman from Pennsylvania ought not to be alarmed, because Mr. Cromwell no doubt will have the Senate pass his antialimony and birth-control programs, which are the principal planks in his plan to solve the political and economic ills of the United States.

Mr. RICH. When this administration came into power, you heard them talk about economic royalists, and they talked about nothing else. We want to know who they are. If there is anybody who has ever put in office a lot of economic royalists, I want to know who in the world it is except the man in the White House. He is the greatest economic royalist in this country, if I know what the term means. He has taken over Wall Street, and he has it down there in the White House, and he is spending more money than any man in the history of the world, and still he is not satisfied with that. He still wants more power, and he is going to get more power if this Congress does what he wants them to do, but I hope to goodness this Congress will not give him any more power. I think they have given enough, and what they ought to do is to take power away from him. Let him be President in accordance with the Constitution.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. Oh, I am not going to get a chance to talk on this bill at all if I yield all my time.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Why, take this Cromwell. He is a multimillionaire, who married Doris Duke, the richest woman in the United States. Mr. Cromwell is a great New Deal liberal leader—liberal with other people's money. If he sympathizes so much with foreign countries, as his June 15 speech indicates, let him take his own millions of dollars and hand them to those foreign countries, and let him go to Canada and enlist for active service in the British or French Foreign Legions or the Canadian expeditionary force.

Mr. RICH. Oh, by the time he gets through with the $40,000,000 that he married into, after we get through taxing him to pay for the New Deal, he will wonder whether he wants to be a Senator from New Jersey under the New Deal or not.

Now, let us get down to this bill. Here is what I want to bring out. We are appropriating $18,500,000 for the Post Office Department. That is the Department that Jim Farley has been running so inefficiently, and it is $40,000,000 in the red. We have given him 3-cent postage, $100,000,000 a year revenue, and still $40,000,000 more in the red.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. RICH. Oh, I shall have to have 3 minutes more; and if the gentleman from Massachusetts has not any more time, I will ask the gentleman from Virginia to give me 3 minutes.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, in view of the highly constructive Republican utterances of the gentleman, I am glad to yield him 3 minutes.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the subcommittee, who has nobody to talk about the bill on his side, ought to give me 10 minutes, because I could talk an hour or 2 hours or 2 days on the inefficiency of the New Deal. When we gave Farley 3-cent postage, it raised $100,000,000 for the Post Office Department, and that was for the purpose of taking care of the expenses of the New Deal, but what has happened? Jim Farley has given that all to the Post Office Department and there is nothing left to pay expenses. Where are these $40,000,000 in the red? It seems to me that is a terrible situation in the Post Office Department. The people of this country will never get rid of the 3-cent postage unless they go $100,000,000 more in the red. Then we have departments of Government giving out millions of dollars of material free. I think Congress ought to pass a law prohibiting the franking of this great mass of publications, and when the Republicans get into power in January, I am going to advocate that they stop this free distribution of literature by these departments. I know that when we get the Republicans in power in January, they will just simply put their foot down and they will not permit it. They will stop the departments from the mass of publications and the abuse of the franking privilege by the departments and the Members of Congress.

I want you Republican boys on this side to remember this promise I am making to these Democratic fellows over here. I want you to back me up in January, because we will have more fellows over here in January to help out on that proposition. Do not let anybody fool you on that, because the people of this country are sick and tired of squandering; they are sick and tired of spending; they are sick and tired of inefficiency; doing these things which are not sound and which are not good business.

Let me show you in this bill. They have appropriated $200,000 for that San Francisco Fair and $275,000 for the New York Fair. We appropriated millions of dollars to those fairs last year. Now they come along this year and want to continue them. Why should the public pay to continue those fairs for the year 1940 when they had the fairs in 1939 and we paid to help keep them going? It seems to me that is money that the Congress should not appropriate. I tried to strike that out in committee. I got pretty good support, but I could not get enough support to knock it out, because the Appropriations Committee, which is controlled by that side of the House, would not do it.

Then we have the Federal Crop Insurance increase of capital stock to meet losses. Now, just get this. You fellows on this side listen: "Federal Crop Insurance, increase of capital stock to meet losses." That is what you will have to do for years and years to meet the losses of this administration. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT] is still on the floor. He asked the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] if he did not think we should move aircraft factories and munition factories to the interior of the country. I want to direct his attention to some figures inserted in the RECORD in the middle of February pointing out that if we pick out the most probable—nobody knows whether it is possible—but the most probable points of attack in the United States, the gentleman from Missouri will find that St. Louis, Mo., is nearer to five of those points of attack than is Hartford, Conn., for example. We have no assurance and no man knows, if we ever have to defend this territory, whether the attack is going to come from the east or the northeast. It is just as likely to come from the Gulf or the north or the Pacific, but we may find in the long run that Maine would be the safest spot in the United States.

While the geographical location may be important, the one thing we want now is speed and efficiency. It is going to take a long time to transplant and transport skilled mechanics who are settled in one section of the country to another section of the country. It is not that other parts of the country are not as competent to make fine tools and turn out skilled work.

It is simply because of the condition of the land and the climate of the country that one part gives all of the farm commodities that we need—cotton, wheat, and corn—while other parts, because they do not have the climatic conditions needed for the raising of large crops, have directed their attention and the training of their people to the skilled crafts. I would like to refer you to page 2193 of the RECORD of February 13, wherein I said:

> I have referred to the necessity of having skilled mechanics to manufacture and build our aircraft. Recently a manufacturer of national reputation employed a firm of industrial engineers to make a survey of several different parts of the United States, with the view to building a new factory, the factory to be equipped to build a very necessary part of an aviation engine. This group of industrial engineers surveyed several States of the United States and then made their recommendation to the manufacturer who engaged them.
> Among other things mentioned in the report was that the industrial engineers found that Connecticut has the largest supply, generally distributed, of skilled labor in the United States. The following shows for a number of States the number per square mile of workers in certain machine and technical-product industries requiring skilled labor:

California	0.17
Connecticut	13.69
Illinois	1.58
Maryland	.25
Massachusetts	6.27
New Jersey	5.29
New York	1.53
North Carolina	.01
Ohio	2.10
Pennsylvania	1.66
Virginia	.02

> This same firm of industrial engineers, having ascertained from experts on defensive tactics against aircraft the ideal type of territory to defend, stated in this report that of all the places studied in the plant survey, the central part of Connecticut appears to be closest to the ideal.

I hope that in our enthusiasm to develop this national defense we will not upset the economic side of the country any more than is necessary. It would seem pertinent, therefore, that we take advantage of the facilities already established for the creation of the needs of our defense system and put aside any plan to move the center of such facilities inland. Such a plan as that suggested by the gentleman from Missouri would be an extravagance in time and dollars which we can now ill afford.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LAMBERTSON].

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, when we reach the item on the Weather Bureau in this bill, which provides $50,000 for a new station at Boston, I am going to move to strike it out. I have opposed it in the subcommittee and in the whole committee. It lost in the subcommittee by a narrow margin and in the whole committee by a narrow margin. While it is only a $50,000 item, there are some principles involved that are of tremendous importance.

I want to speak on the merits of those propositions right now. First of all, I am the ranking Republican member on the Subcommittee on Agricultural Appropriations, under which the Weather Bureau has been functioning for years. Under the reorganization plan it will be transferred next year to Commerce. It would not be our property any longer if we are still here and on the Agricultural Subcommittee. But this item of $50,000 for an independent weather station at Boston is not a deficiency. This is a deficiency bill. There is not any man who is a member of the Deficiency Appropriations Subcommittee who will stand here and say that this is a deficiency. I yield right now to any member of the Appropriations Committee if he wants to stand and say that this is a deficiency. There are prominent members of that committee on both sides present. Nobody disputes my argument.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Well, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Of course, if the gentleman means to infer from that that there is nothing in this bill except deficiencies, he is entirely wrong, because this bill carries two classes of items—deficiency items, that is, items which are meant to build up the appropriation for this year, and class two, supplementary items for 1941. There are many supplementary items in this bill.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. There are supplementary items in here that deal more or less with national defense, which is the leading thing of the hour.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I yield.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Following out the thought of the gentleman from Virginia, I would call attention to the fact that the deficiency items in the bill amount to $22,000,000 as compared with supplementary items amounting to over $34,000,000.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. That is very true, but this in no sense of the word is supplemental to anything else. It is neither a deficiency nor supplemental. We should not consider in this bill items that should properly have been brought before regular committees. There is no emergency about this. It is no deficiency, it is no emergency, so it ought not to be here; first, because it is not proper, and second, because in the regular order of things the regular committee should handle this proposition. The regular committees will be meeting in December. The Committee on Commerce can then hear this proposition on its merits.

My second point, after I have emphasized the fact that it is not a deficiency, is that it did not originate with the Weather Bureau. I want to enlarge on that a little, I want to read just a sentence or two from the hearings.

Commander Reichelderfer, one of the most efficient bureau heads we have, a very technical high-class man, who has been lent to the Weather Bureau from the Navy Department, a man who did not come up in the ordinary way, heads the Weather Bureau. He says they had nothing to do with originating this project, meaning the $50,000 item for Boston's independent weather station. He said:

> We had no plan to add new forecast districts this present year. In fact we have not enough forecasters and would have postponed this recommendation if there were not an urgent public demand and need for this New England service.

I want to comment a minute later on that public demand.

> The Weather Bureau has no promotion agents. It needs none. Demands for weather service always greatly exceed the capacity of our personnel and facilities.

The Weather Bureau has eight main stations in the United States today: Jacksonville, Washington, Chicago, New Orleans, Denver, and San Francisco, and substations at Albuquerque and Kansas City. The Weather Bureau would like to have six others ultimately.

Yesterday I solicited this distinguished Commander, the head of the Weather Bureau, to give me information as to whether Boston was the most needed. He refused to say so, he refused to go on record as saying that Boston was the most needed proposed new station of the future.

The main thing I am getting to is that this was conceived in the mind of somebody who wanted to get something for Boston. A distinguished Member of the House and a distinguished Senator promoted this thing. They even got the Budget to agree to it. It seems as though if you have enough power, regardless of the merit of the proposition, you can get a Budget estimate—if you are a big shot. And they did that; yet the Weather Bureau itself for 2 years before our subcommittee has not even asked for this item, and there is no emergency.

They used the argument that because of the hurricane that happened a few years ago if they had had this station it might have been different. That is answered completely in the extended hearings of 2 years ago before our subcommittee. This same man, this Commander Reichelderfer, said that if we had had the four-map system by which at every 6-hour interval in the 24 there is a map of the weather given over the wires to these different stations, they might have been forewarned and it might have helped them to prepare for it. But since that time, since the hurricane, the whole east coast has gotten the four-map system. It is now in use from the Atlantic to the Mississippi River, but not from the Mississippi River to the Pacific. If there is to be any extension in Weather Bureau facilities it is deserving that it should be west of the Mississippi River over the mountains to the west, over that great half of the United States where they have only two Weather Bureau stations now—Denver and San Francisco. Seattle or Portland could ask with lots more grace for a station than Boston. Boston is only 500 miles or less from Washington. Seattle and Portland are a great deal farther than that from San Francisco. Denver is more than a thousand miles from Chicago and New Orleans. Los Angeles has not any individual set-up. Los Angeles or Seattle could ask for it with more excuse than Boston, but they did not have the politicians to put it over, they did not go out and put on the fire and the heat.

Furthermore, nobody is going to answer me on the floor of this House for what I am saying. They are going to ignore the whole proposition. But they condone this thing. I do not think I would be violating any confidence here if I told you that we had this thing beaten by one vote in the subcommittee at one time. This took up hours of our time in the subcommittee and in the full committee, yet nobody is going to challenge my statement here today or deny what I say. They are going to ignore it. But I think it is well for the public and the country to know a little bit about this proposition and the way it has been handled. As I say, it was at one time beaten in the subcommittee by one vote. Then one Member remembered that he had promised somebody personally that he would vote for this thing. So he backed up and started the other way. Then the justifications came in and they began to justify it as far as they could. But it is in the bill because of the activities of a small group of men, one or two men who had made personal promises enough to put this whole thing over. I want to say to you that I do not regard friendship if it depends on the raiding of the Federal Treasury. For myself I hope I will never come before this House—and I have been on this committee 8 years—to ask for any appropriation for my congressional district.

I want to be different from a lot of men without bragging about it. I want my record in Congress to be that I never asked for anything for my particular congressional district that was not needed. I took an oath to support the Constitution as a United States Representative and I want to live up to doing just that. I am not a member of the committee to see how much I can get for my district, my State, or my section of the country. There is not a member of the Appropriations Committee who can point his finger to me and say that I have been inconsistent in my ideas of economy. At least I do not think they can.

It is a disgrace and a shame that we support propositions of this sort. It is not a deficiency item. It did not originate with the Bureau which gets credit for asking for it. That Bureau did not ask for it of its own volition. That Bureau was forced to include it because of pressure and it refused to say even that the Boston station is the most important of those places that have not been taken care of for the future. The same thing that has been said for Boston could be said for all these others that I mentioned here today. I do not pretend to have any influence on either side, but this side has the responsibility for the wild spending that has been going on. They have the responsibility for everything. To my Republican friends, to my Republican colleagues, who stand for economy, may I say that the National Treasury is our first line of defense and that is the thing we are going to emphasize next week at Philadelphia. We are going to ride the New Deal for its spending. We are going to defend another principle and that is the taking care of the Treasury and the national credit.

Mr. Chairman, when I offer an amendment this afternoon to strike out this $50,000 item which is not justified, it is not a deficiency item; it is not justified because it comes from a department or bureau that asks for it, I hope my Republican colleagues will support me if they think it is sound. Do not support me for myself, but if you think it is right in the light of the testimony offered I want you to support my amendment to strike it out.

There is a lot more I might say about this thing today. It is significant; I think it is important, since we spent hours in the subcommittee talking about it. We spent an hour this morning in the whole committee debating it. There will not be another Member on this floor who will say a word about it today but myself. My great distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Missouri, spoke for a half-hour before the whole committee urging that it be taken out. I am afraid he will not say a word this afternoon. He has his own reasons for that, and, of course, I am not criticising him for that, but I cannot understand why he will not get up here and condemn it like he did in the whole committee. This matter belongs to our subcommittee. It is not a deficiency item. It did not originate with the department. It was put over by individuals who are seeking to get a little glory for their section. I do not say that is true of everyone's attitude, but I am saying that is the attitude that put this thing over, a very narrow attitude. I want you to stand by me when I offer an amendment to strike this item when the bill is read for amendment. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, my distinguished friend from Kansas is making a mountain out of a molehill. I admire and respect my friend for his frankness of expression. There was no need of him extending me the consideration of refraining from using my name when he talked about politicians. I am rather proud to be a politician. I do not think it is a disgrace to be a politician. I assume my friend used that term in the broad sense that would make the characterization applicable to himself, because I assume like myself that he, being a Member of the House, will admit he occupies the same position that I occupy or that anyone else here occupies. I never considered it to be a crime; as far as I am concerned I always treated with a great deal of pride, the fact that I have been elected to represent my district in various public offices I have held. I was rather interested in his Confessions of a Congressman. It seems to be a serious crime for one Member of this body or of any legislative body to speak to some of his colleagues about a matter that he is interested in that may come before a committee. I welcome and invite every one of my colleagues to speak to me on any matter that they are interested in, whether it comes before the committee of which I am a member or a matter which comes before the House. This is the first time I have ever heard the argument that Members of Congress should embargo themselves from talking to other Members of Congress in connection with matters in which they are interested.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I did not say that, or at least I did not mean to say that.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman's apology is accepted for the RECORD.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. May I add this: What I objected to was Members yielding to a personal appeal on something that was not needed.

Mr. McCORMACK. I never knew that to be a crime in a legislative body.

The gentleman first advanced the argument that this is not a deficiency item. Then the distinguished gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from Massachusetts, my distinguished friend also, overwhelmed him when they showed that items other than deficiency items were contained in the bill. Then he talked about an emergency and about this not being an emergency. But this is an emergency. He then talked about my personal pride in having the appropriation made. I have a personal pride in being a Member of this body. I have no personal pride in anything I might do. I simply try to do the best I can.

But here is the story. This did not originate in my mind. This was started by the Boston Herald, one of the leading newspapers of the country and a great Republican organ. That is where this movement originated to have a Weather Bureau station for New England. This is for the great district of New England and not for Boston. Of course, the office will be located in Boston. All of the Members of this body from New England, both Republicans and Democrats, are united in favor of this. This is one thing that we all agree upon.

Mr. Chairman, this was not conceived in my mind. It was fathered by the Boston Herald. It was started because, under the forecasting system at the present time, a correct forecast of the hurricane of a few years ago was not made. A forecast of the great snowstorm of last winter was not made. The Weather Bureau Service in Washington is not to blame. Now, New England has a northeast wind which changes rapidly. In the course of a minute it might change very much. It is a variable wind. If there is one place in the country where a station of this kind is needed it is New England. My friend talks about other districts. I think they should be located in other districts, and certainly I would not take the floor, if my friend wanted one located in his district, and argue that because New England did not have it I would not support one being located in his district. To me that would be a selfish argument. To me that would be an argument that I would view in my own mind with shame of myself. I would have a feeling of disrespect for myself, and what I say is not directed toward my friend in comparison.

Now, this is needed; this is an emergency, and it was not started by me. It was started by a great organ that I admire. It is an organ that is Republican in its editorial policy, but it is a great organ and that is where this movement started, with the Boston Herald, and I assume every Member of the House, particularly the Republican Members, are acquainted with the editorial policy of the Boston Herald.

Now, this, briefly, is a statement of the facts. I hope my friend will view this from a broad, practical angle, realizing there are eight such district stations or districts now in the United States, and because there are four or five other districts that should have it, he will not offer a motion to strike out this item. If he does, I hope the membership of the House will not support the motion. [Applause.]

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
WEATHER BUREAU,
Washington, June 15, 1940.

Hon. JOHN W. McCORMACK,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. McCORMACK: In response to your telephone inquiry, it is stated that subsequent to the submission of the regular estimates for the Weather Bureau for the fiscal year 1941, urgent request has been made to correct basic deficiencies in the weather forecast and storm-warning service rendered by this Bureau to the New England area by establishing a forecast district center at Boston, Mass., to serve that area. The citizens residing in New England justly complain of the inadequacy of the weather forecast service now provided because the forecasts are now issued from the distant forecast center at Washington, D. C.

New England, because of its location, varied topography and geographical features, presents forecast problems of a regional nature that require the application of special techniques based on an intimate knowledge of local conditions and their effect on weather occurrences. The territory comprising this district is crossed by two active storm paths and is affected both winter and summer not only by disturbances crossing the country from the West but also by coastal storms approaching from the South. It is impracticable, because of the large size of the Washington forecast district as now constituted, for the forecasters to give as extensive a detailed study to the changing weather conditions as is necessary to render the highly accurate and localized service to which the people of New England are entitled, and which can only be rendered from a city situated within the area to be served.

The Weather Bureau is engaged in a program to organize its field service to provide better local weather forecasts in various parts of the country and has recognized that New England would profit materially from an improved and localized weather service. The general program contemplates an increase in the number of forecast districts with resultant reduction in size of districts, which would permit the forecasters to give greater attention to detailed local forecasts. Unfortunately, the Bureau does not at the present time have the funds to put this plan into effect.

A bill to authorize an appropriation for a Weather Bureau district forecast station at Boston, H. R. 9064, was passed by the House of Representatives on May 20, 1940. Should the Congress appropriate the amount of $50,000 authorized to be appropriated by the bill for the purpose of providing the additional personnel and facilities at Boston to establish a forecast district for New England, this would be of decided advantage in improving the forecast service of the Weather Bureau.

Your interest in this matter is greatly appreciated.

Very truly yours,

C. C. CLARK,
Acting Chief of Bureau.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Chairman, I notice that the Committee on Appropriations has left out of this bill the million dollars which the President requested for developing a possible supply of rubber in the Western Hemisphere.

I would like to ask the members of the committee how they justify leaving this item out of the bill. May I ask the chairman of the subcommittee that question?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. The committee felt that there had not been sufficient justification made for it and, particularly, on the ground that already the industry was developing synthetic rubber and that there had been no very good showing made to justify the expenditure of further funds for experimental purposes.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. It is true, is it not, that the funds requested by the President were to be used mostly in Central and South America and very little in continental United States?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. That is correct.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON of California. I yield.

Mr. FISH. As I understood the matter, the million dollars I was talking about all went to South America to make a survey and none for synthetic rubber.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. As I understand it, from reading the communication addressed to the House by the President of the United States, the request was for $1,000,000 to be used in the development of rubber from the Hevea rubber tree in the Western Hemisphere, most of the funds to be spent in South and Central America, although there was some mention made of using a portion of the funds in the Gulf States and Florida.

Mr. FISH. No rubber has ever been produced in either Florida or the Gulf States.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. No; but there have been successful experiments in southern Florida. If I am wrong I wish to be corrected, but I think the hearings prove that rubber can be successfully grown in the southern tip of Florida from the Hevea rubber tree.

However, I am more interested in the possibility of producing rubber from the guayule rubber shrub or plant which is a native of Mexico. It originally produced rubber to about 8 percent of the volume of the plant. Selective cross breeding and experimentation have now developed guayule to the point where it will produce as much as 25-percent rubber. I happen to know something about it because there is a factory located in my district which can produce refined rubber at the rate of about 10,000 pounds per day.

According to the figures I have available this rubber can be produced at a cost of about 25 cents a pound. Rubber at the present time, that is the price in the United States for the rubber that we import, is approximately 22 cents per pound. It seems to me there is some justification for the expenditure of a certain amount of funds to find out if we can produce commercially one of our most vital and essential materials; a product that is extremely important to our national-defense program. If it is possible to produce rubber commercially, domestically, I do not see why we should hide our heads in the sand like ostriches and let the opportunity go by.

Now, if you will refer to the hearings, you will find that Dr. Auchter of the Department of Agriculture rather contradicts himself in a couple of statements he made. On page 172 in reply to a question by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], we find the following:

> Mr. TABER. Why did you not go to California, where they are doing some of the work themselves, and do business there instead of going outside the country?
> Dr. AUCHTER. You are referring to guayule, that is grown out there. Guayule can be grown in the Southwest. The cost of producing cultivated guayule is so high that under normal conditions it probably cannot be produced profitably in competition with Hevea rubber from the Tropics.

Now, if you will turn to page 464, in a letter addressed to me by Dr. Auchter, you will find that he says in the last paragraph on that page:

> These experiments indicated that guayule can be raised commercially in the United States at a cost of from 25 to 30 cents a pound and contracts were prepared for having local farmers grow the guayule, the planting and harvesting being done by the American Rubber Producers, Inc.

If Dr. Auchter's statement regarding the cost of production is correct, then it appears to me that we are passing up a real chance to assist the American farmer in the production of a new crop. We appropriate a billion dollars a year to help agriculture, but we are still a long way from solving the farmer's problem.

I am not going to attempt to insert the necessary funds into this bill at this time, because the committee has already stricken out the entire item. However, in ignoring this item it seems to me that we are passing up a splendid opportunity to put some of the agricultural lands now growing surplus commodities into the production of one of our vital and essential materials. I trust that when this bill reaches the other body some of the Senators will be far-sighted enough to include funds for developing rubber production in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, in response to the query just made by the gentleman from California [Mr. ANDERSON] about exploration in the field of rubber and tropical plants, I might say it is not new. Mr. Thomas Alva Edison was a pioneer in that field, and the closest he ever came to rubber was to develop the goldenrod plant and get a very small production of rubber content. As I recall, he turned over those files to the Bureau of Plant Industry in the Department of Agriculture, and going back to 1933, we made an appropriation of $75,000 for that Bureau for that purpose. Since that time they have been experimenting with guayule, and with Hevea and one other plant grown in Florida and with goldenrod and with a great many others, and after an expenditure of approximately $438,000 over an 8-year period we still have nothing tangible to show for that research and that exploratory effort. My contention is that since the emphasis today is on synthetic rubber, like duprene, neoprene, and other types gotten out by the Goodrich and Du Pont people, and a great many others, that perhaps we will go infinitely further if we let the research come from that side. Only last week either Goodyear or Goodrich held an exposition in New York City and there announced to the country that they had made such progress that they propose now to fabricate the treads on rubber tires from so-called synthetic rubber. In view of those developments in the industrial field it occurs to me it would be unwarranted to spend any great amount of money at this time, because the Department simply has not shown any tangible results.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Private industry has experimented with the guayule plant and is now producing rubber commercially at a cost not far in excess of the price we have to pay for imported rubber. If we had some practical experiments made by the Department of Agriculture is it not possible that we might develop something of value?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think it is a splendid idea to let private industry operate in this field for a time and see what results they can develop.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. May I call attention to the statement made by Mr. Wheeler at page 180 of the hearings? Questioned about producing rubber out of petroleum he states:

> We can if we are willing to pay 50 to 60 cents a pound for it.

It seems to me that if we could develop rubber from a homegrown plant at half that cost we would be much wiser to adopt that method of producing rubber than to take it from petroleum.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I would say that considering the climatic conditions of our country, probably the greatest development will be in our industrial field. In the light of eight successive annual appropriations, some of which I approved as a member of the subcommittee on agriculture, I think perhaps we should withhold this appropriation for a while and let industry do the job.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JONES].

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], to be yielded as he sees fit.

Mr. TABER. I yield that additional 5 minutes also to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JONES].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. JONES of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, the President has again said that he wants to cut the expenses of government 10 percent. It is an old story, and familiarity produces the proverbial results still. He promised to reduce expenses before he was elected in 1932. Every once and so often when the demand for reasonable economies becomes too loud to be ignored we get another promise. The reorganization bill was to be the shears with which Federal expenses and personnel would be reduced. I did not believe that promise. I voted against that bill, and the mounting pay rolls since it was made law do not hurt my conscience any.

In answer to every suggestion for economies from this side of the House, frequently supported by Members on the Democratic side, whose colleagues forthwith dismiss them as reactionaries, the administration supporters retort that we cannot economize at the expense of human misery. No one has ever asked for economy at the cost of the unemployed, or to the hurt of the national defense, for the obvious effect would be political suicide if not national self-mutilation.

That is proof to me that the majority has no sensible defense against economies where they can be made and should be made not only to save the taxpayers money but to make government more efficient.

I accept the sneering challenge so often produced by the administration to put up or shut up, to show where economy can be made and efficiency thereby achieved. I produce the indefensible and grandiose propaganda machine as a prime example of waste in money, in time, and the people's patience. They are disguised in the departmental budgets as "information services," as ironical a joke as ever was perpetrated. Information services, indeed!

I found them to be anything but that when I sent out questionnaires to the dozens of propaganda bureaus which infest our governmental structure, exploiting human misery, arousing class hatreds, and gaudily dramatizing the New Deal. I asked for factual information as to the costs of their individual operations, and I was answered with subterfuges and evasions too often to be accidental.

However, I found out a lot. One of the first things I found out is that in most cases these Federal press agents, these New Deal publicity men, grinding out political propaganda at public expense, have no standing in law. The publicity bureaus are illegal. They are specifically prohibited. But there they are; and if the President is for once sincere in his avowed desire to cut expenses, he can save millions of dollars a year just by obeying the law and ridding the Government of this propaganda leech which has fastened itself upon us without authorization or sanction of Congress.

We cannot discover exactly what the propagandists cost us in dollars. Let me read you this confessional paragraph from the Bureau of the Budget, in a letter to me signed by Harold Smith. Its date is April 11, 1940:

> Generally speaking, there is no segregation in the accounting, budgetary, or appropriating procedures of the Federal Government of publications, publicity, or news material as specific objects or purposes of expenditure. As a consequence, it would be a practical impossibility to prepare a compilation of the actual costs under these heads over any period of years.

Now let me read you a sentence from a letter written to me by Secretary of the Interior Harold Ickes. Just 12 words:

> This Department, in accordance with the law, does not maintain publicity personnel.

The Bureau of the Budget says the costs of publicity—it uses the word "publicity"—are too well concealed to be produced. Mr. Ickes says there "ain't" no such animal. Well, I invite you to turn to the hearings on the Department of Interior appropriation with me. I quote from page 20 of the 1941 appropriation hearings:

> I remember that Mr. Straus, the Director of Information, came in sometime ago and said he would like to put on a dramatization of the annual report of the Secretary of the Interior. I told him that he was crazy, that it could not be done in any attractive form. However, in due course he brought in to me a script which I read with great care. It seemed to me to have possibilities and I gave a clearance for it.

Probably some of you have heard his dramatized annual report. Whether you did or not you must know that it took days and weeks of the time of experienced publicity writers of the Department of the Interior to build up a program that would tell the country that the Secretary of the Interior was a great guy; that he bears gifts for every State in the Union. The general idea is that if Secretary Ickes had not lived Joe Doaks, out in the sticks, could not get a Federal check.

Anyone reading this report and listening to the dramatization that I have described must be naive indeed if he does not believe the Department of the Interior maintains publicity personnel. They may not call them publicity experts when they list the duties of the employees for the Bureau of the Budget, but this report and every other news release is prepared by publicity experts, regardless of whether they are called clerks or assistants in the Department of the Interior, or "red herrings."

On April 12 I asked the Secretary of the Interior to furnish me with detailed information in regard to the publicity activities in his Department. On the 25th I received a general reply, which did not answer the specific questions I asked of him, and it ended with this paragraph:

> Therefore I shall seek to see if we cannot assemble for transmission to you more detailed data. Your requests for various categories and divisions of such assignments of time and money do not correspond with any of the numerous classifications required by various procedures. In themselves, your inquiries comprise an expensive and time-consuming task. Of course, break-downs for the past 5 years, etc., on this subject, which you requested by April 17, are impossible.

On the 26th I again wrote the Secretary of Interior the following letter:

> In answer to your letter of the 25th, wherein you state that considerable time is being taken to answer my questionnaire of the 12th, because my inquiry covers break-downs for the past 5 years on the subject of information activities in your Department.
>
> I assume you have the figures for a late fiscal year. I would appreciate it, if it will convenience you, to give me at the present time the answers to the questions for the latest fiscal years for which figures are available and give me the other data at a later date. My immediate purpose will be served by having such figures for the latest fiscal year.
>
> I did not think that it would entail the time that you report because I had in mind that you would have a cost accounting system to enable you to answer questions touching this phase of your operations in your request for funds before the Appropriations Committee.
>
> If you can give me the figures for the latest fiscal years for which complete figures are available by Monday, April the 29th, I will deeply appreciate it.
> I might add that if actors are paid for through the program division in connection with the broadcast of radio programs and the production of movies by your Department, I would appreciate your advising me so that I may pursue this source at an early date.

On April 27 I received photostatic copies of reports of the secretary of the Bureau of the Budget, which had been made January 22, 1940, and were available all of the time that I asked the Secretary of the Interior to furnish me information from April 12 until April 27.

I would appreciate any reasonable explanation why the Secretary of the Interior could not give me this information when I first asked for it. The reason may be that the Secretary of the Interior has so covered up the Division of Information by labeling publicity employees as "assistants," "clerks," and "stenographers," in order to keep Congress from knowing how much is really being spent for propaganda, that he has lost track of their identity himself.

I put in the RECORD for the consideration of the Members copy of the photostatic report on the Bonneville Power Administration. This report was given over the signature of the Chief of Division of Information for the Bonneville project. It shows an expenditure of $6,298 for personal services in this project for publicity work. However, on the 29th of March 1940 the same John L. Wheeler wrote to a Member of Congress, and I quote from his letter:

The present personnel of the Information Division numbers 14, with an annual pay-roll encumbrance of $28,600. The personnel includes clerical, filing, and messenger help and the staff of the project's technical library.

Members of Congress, which one of these statements is correct, the $6,298 figure given to the Bureau of the Budget or the $28,600 figure quoted in this letter?

While we are on the subject of power projects, let me call your attention to the Tennessee Valley Authority. I quote from their letter in answer to my inquiry as to their information service:

To answer your question directly, the staff includes seven information employees, whose combined salary is $31,450.

I quote further from his letter in regard to what the publicity department does:

For the most part they include notices of contract awards, major speeches by directors, and pertinent information of a policy nature.

Now, the odd part about the answer to the inquiry is that when you turn to the hearings on the T. V. A. before the House Appropriations Committee, Subcommittee on Independent Offices of the Appropriations Bill for 1941, page 1688, you will find this statement in regard to the number of employees and the amount spent in the publicity section of the T. V. A. Mr. Auger states in answer to the question of Mr. Wigglesworth:

The total budget for 1941 for information office is $165,000 as compared to $167,000 for 1940 and an actual of $178,000 in 1939. The total personnel, including all employees of the information office, which includes our technical library, is 40, which compares to 40.8 in 1940 and 43 in 1939.

If an information office is justified in the Bonneville project and the T. V. A., certainly Members of Congress are entitled to the true information when they write to ascertain the number of employees in the information section and the cost of maintaining this section. There is no justification or excuse to mislead Members of Congress as to the amount of money that is spent for these services.

Two months has elapsed since I asked the Secretary of Interior to give me detailed information on the cost of the various informational activities in his Department for the last 5 years. The Secretary of Interior gives lip service in giving the public an interesting report on all the activities of his Department, but in 2 months' time he cannot give a Member of Congress, who ought to know, and who is entitled to know, when he asks for the cost to the Government of maintaining information service in his Department. Why does he fail to give this information to Members of Congress? Can it be that the Secretary of the Interior is trying to cover up the real cost and expenditure of money in his Department to sell the public that he is a great guy? The Secretary does not dare tell the public of the enormous amount of money that is spent for propaganda in his Department because the whole Interior Department is interwoven with men and women who do not add one iota to the service of their country, but spend their full time or a great portion of it in campaigning for the New Deal.

I sent an inquiry to the Department of Justice in regard to information on publicity activity in that Department, and from Gordon Dean, Special Executive Assistant to the Attorney General, I received a reply from which I quote:

In the first place it should be pointed out that the Department of Justice, unlike some of the other departments of Government, has no "publicity" unit, as that term is ordinarily understood. We do, however, conduct an "information" which is more fully described below.

Now, if the Department of Justice, the Federal law enforcement agency knows that other departments maintain publicity bureaus, then it is countenancing a violation of the law. It is the duty of the Attorney General at least to warn his Federal Cabinet members to halt the illegal practice. Actually he should order them to stop violating the act of 1913 and prosecute them if they refuse. The Attorney General's office and the offices of the Secretary of the Interior and other Cabinet officers are on two horns of a dilemma. If what they are doing is legal, then information and publicity employees should be labeled as such and they should be budgeted in such a way that the Appropriations Committee and the Budget Commission could know immediately how much publicity and information services were costing the Government. There should not be any hiding of publicity experts behind false titles. If it is wrong, the Attorney General's office should be the first to uncover the subterfuge and stop it. Violators of the law in the Federal departments should be hounded with the same zeal that the Attorney General's office would run down any other violator of the law.

There is another mischief that should be looked into at this time when we are hunting the "fifth column" and the subversive groups in America and in our Federal branches of the Government. A few months ago the Dies committee published a list of the Federal employees who belong to subversive groups. Some of those published names are reported to hold harmless jobs as clerks and assistants. As long as the administration insists on covering up and hiding the information services in its departments, just that long will the American people not know how many harmless-sounding titles cover up a publicity "fifth columnist" who is spreading his poison of propaganda and hate of class against class to the American people and giving his false American doctrines the dignity of our great Government.

If these publicity experts are so hidden that the Departments themselves cannot recognize their extent and expense, we certainly have a weak spot in the structure of democratic government through which the Trojan horses can push their way at will.

We Americans, with our constitutional government, are morally strong enough, patriotic enough, to defend ourselves against all subversive attacks. But when constitutional government itself becomes impaired, when illegal authority within government dips its hand in the Treasury's coffers to finance a campaign of woe and disunion in our country, then in all patriotism, in all common sense, that rot must be amputated and the new dealers who planted the germ cut off from power with the same stroke. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG].

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, some time ago when the agricultural appropriation bill was before this House, I offered an amendment increasing the amount allowed in that bill for the work done in Texas, New Mexico, and parts of Arizona for the control of the pink bollworm. It so happens that at that time the subcommittee in charge of the Department of Agriculture appropriation bill did not have before it the Budget Director's supplementary recommendation. Due to the strange confusion which has accompanied this item throughout, I take this time to direct the attention not only of the members of the committee, but the attention of the Director of the Budget to the peculiar situation which confronts this most important item in the appropriation.

This deficiency bill does not make any mention of the pink bollworm. It so happens that the Budget Director sent a supplementary estimate to this committee in Document No. 802 on June 3, but at the time that was received the agriculture appropriation bill was in conference and the Senate had added to that bill the required amount recommended by the Budget Director. In the meantime this bill is voted out of committee and does not carry this item. I do not propose to offer an amendment increasing the amount, because the item was not discussed by the committee the second time, and some of the members of the committee apparently are facile in forgetting these things that apparently they do not want to pay attention to. I want the members of the committee to at least remember long enough, until this deficiency appropriation bill comes back from the Senate, at which time the Senate will have received an additional recommendation from the Budget, increasing the amount by $380,000 recommended by me in the earlier appropriation. If this amount is not allowed in the Senate, we have every cause for more than reasonable alarm over the welfare of the entire Cotton Belt. If we do not take care of this pest and keep it from spreading, it is good-bye cotton.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, in the light of what was said this morning by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT] and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER], I think I should say a word for the area from which I come with reference to its desirability as a location for the placement of airplane factories, or the training of our aviators and mechanics.

In Minnesota, especially around the Twin Cities, where we have one of the finest airports in the world, known as the Wold-Chamberlain Airport, named after two World War heroes, we have just about the finest weather conditions in the Nation for the year round manufacture and flying of airplanes and training of pilots.

We have an average of about 3 stormy days a month; in other words, practically all of our weather is bright, clear, and sunshiny. I noticed in a local eastern paper that 29 days of one month were cloudy or stormy for that particular locality.

We have the correct temperature for training flyers, a temperature which would make it possible for them to get training under all conditions. And on those rolling prairies we have a level terrain devoid of mountains and high hills which you find in so many districts. I well realize that the gentleman from Connecticut has a wonderful lay-out, as does the gentleman from Missouri at St. Louis. But they do not compare with our own lay-out up in the Twin City area.

In addition to the wonderful weather conditions there, we have a reservoir of native-born labor, high-class mechanics, many of them now unemployed who are available and waiting to be called to serve the Nation in its present emergency and need to hasten preparedness.

Let me call the attention of the powers that be, of the authorities in control of the proposed program, who will make the decisions that are to be made within the next few weeks with reference to this problem, to the thing which every school child knows stopped Napoleon and defeated him in his historic campaign against the Russians; to what is now being practiced in China; to what the French tried to do last week when they moved their Government from Paris into the center of the nation at Tours; and to what, in my mind, is just good common sense; that is, that we should get our defensive industry and strategic factories inland. Get them into the center of the Nation as far away from enemy bombing and attack as possible.

This is especially practical with reference to the airplane industry and the training of pilots, and I hope the Government authorities will consider it their patriotic duty to set up their contemplated airplane expansion program in the midcontinent area, starting right at the best spot of all, at Minneapolis and St. Paul, where weather and geographical conditions are most attractive. Start in Minnesota, farthest removed in the Nation from all primary danger spots on the coasts, and from the present overcrowded industrialized areas, and where the people are best qualified and capable from every standpoint of cooperating in such a program.

Last week a delegation of aldermen visited the officials here and thoroughly acquainted them with the advantages we have to offer at Minneapolis, and I know there can be no excuse for failure to give active response to their representations. Our people are now awaiting a statement from the administration, indicating that wise and constructive action has been decided upon, and that a preparedness program of inland and midcontinent development is about to be initiated. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COLE].

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I want to comment briefly upon an item in this bill entitled "Veterans' Administration Hospital Facilities." For 10 years I have been doing everything possible to bring about the establishment of a veterans' hospital in Baltimore or vicinity. It has been a long fight with much effort from time to time, starting with a general survey of the needs of the State; appearance before the Federal Board of Hospitalization and finally the approval by this Board of a unit for Baltimore or vicinity based upon their determination of the actual need for a new hospital. My interest in such an improvement started before I entered Congress in 1926 at a time when I was fairly active in the veterans' organizations to which I belonged, then, as well as now. The members of the American Legion, Disabled American Veterans, Veterans of Foreign Wars, Spanish War Veterans, and Jewish War Veterans of the United States, and their respective auxiliaries, have, from the very inception of this matter, been most active and helpful. I want to acknowledge publicly the sincerity of their work and the splendid service they have rendered not only to their active membership but to many ex-service men not enlisted in their respective posts.

The bill before us is the second deficiency appropriation and carries an item of $1,000,000 to remain available until expended for additional hospital and domiciliary facilities. During consideration of this item by the Committee on Appropriations I appeared, at page 487 of the hearings, and presented a statement of the correspondence passing between President Roosevelt and me in reference to this much-needed improvement.

In the President's letter of April 17 I was assured that he, the President, had directed the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, who is Chairman of the Federal Board of Hospitalization, to cause the Board to make a comprehensive review of the entire hospital construction needs and to submit to him on or before May 1 a complete program with recommendations covering the entire subject. This was done, just as President Roosevelt stated, and I am happy to find in the bill today the initial appropriation to carry out what President Roosevelt and the Veterans' Administration believe to be necessary to complete the hospitalization needs for all of our veterans. The veterans, and I believe their many friends in the State of Maryland, will be most appreciative of the cooperation shown by the President in this matter and also of the recommendation which General Hines made to the committee in his statement found at pages 118 to 123, inclusive, of the hearings.

Last year, when a statement was released by the Veterans' Bureau that proposed sites for the new hospital in Baltimore or vicinity, would be received I hoped that by this time the actual location would have been determined and all plans for the improvement released. But it was easy for me to appreciate, when we convened in January, the reasons for the delay in appropriating the necessary funds. I had hoped then that this deficiency bill would provide sufficient money to make the improvement available immediately, but in view of the fact that the national-defense program has required such heavy expenditures, and made necessary so much additional taxation, and has especially called for the increased use of the industries of the country, I am inclined to agree with the position taken by General Hines in his testimony before the committee that the acquisition of the site and the preparation of the plans is about all they could possibly do between now and the first of next year when Congress reconvenes. I quote from his testimony as follows:

Mr. LUDLOW. Without expressing any doubt as to the value of this program, I am wondering why it was brought in on a deficiency bill.

General HINES. The study, Congressman LUDLOW, was not completed in time for the President to really act on it, or else it would have been included earlier. We could have included such an item, but we would have been guessing. With a more definite proposition, we thought it would meet with approval all the way along.

Mr. LUDLOW. In other words, you are ready now to go ahead, whereas you were not ready before?

General HINES. That is right.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. How soon could you start the three new facilities if this appropriation is approved?

General HINES. If we had the money?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Yes.

General HINES. It would require, I should say, from now until the time when you come back again, if you adjourn until the first of the year, before we could have the sites selected, the titles cleared, and the plans ready. In my judgment, we would not be able to go any faster if we had the full amount for all three projects.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. You will be ready to start on the first of the year if this is approved?

General HINES. Yes; we will, in my judgment. Also, in my judgment, knowing how long it takes to clear titles and select sites and draw plans for institutions the size of these, I think $1,000,000 is all we should have at this time.

The important thing is that the first dollar to make the new veterans' hospital for Baltimore or vicinity a reality becomes available as a result of the appropriation now before us. It is the beginning of the early end to a long but successful and worthwhile fight. I am happy to have been in a position, as a Member of Congress, to lend my time and support to this very worthwhile effort, resulting in services of an invaluable character not only to my comrades of Maryland but to all parts of the United States. I say this because it is easy for me to look ahead and prophesy that the new unit to be erected in Baltimore or vicinity will very likely be one of a special character wherein the facilities and medical knowledge available in Baltimore, possibly the greatest medical center of the world, will be utilized for such purposes. I thank the members of the committee for the favorable consideration they have given this item, and hope that in the reading of the bill under the 5-minute rule there will be no effort to disturb the appropriation as now provided.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES].

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I realize that in a few minutes no one can discuss adequately a bill with so many different items and with so much involved, with any degree of satisfaction.

I rise, at this time, however, to call attention to the fact that I think it is high time for the members of the Appropriations Committee, as well as the Members of Congress, to scrutinize a little more carefully these expenditure bills. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that our country is already $45,000,000,000 in debt, and since we are adding four billions more for national defense, and since we are going to add more billions in the future for that purpose, we ought to begin, even at this late date, to cut expenses except where they are absolutely necessary.

I think the total amount in this bill is $57,000,000, most of it, very likely, is needed for the purposes for which it is I think, could well be stricken out. You have in this bill being appropriated, but there are a great many items that, an item of $50,000 for a new weather bureau at Boston. According to the record and according to the debate, this weather bureau was not advocated by the Department in Washington, but was promoted by the good people of Boston. I do not think that the record, so far, has justified the need for the expenditure of this item.

Just to show how you are spending money, this afternoon, in the face of the present crisis, there are two items amounting to $450,000, almost a half million, in this bill to help the World's Fair at San Francisco and the one at New York. Mr. Chairman, we have already spent $3,500,000 on these two institutions within the last year. I think that, in view of the condition of the Treasury, as well as the condition of the country, we had better save that one-half million.

Another thing, Mr. Chairman, there is an appropriation of eighteen and one-half million dollars in this bill for the Post Office Department. I am informed that the various executive departments of the Government cost the Post Office Department something over $40,000,000 a year just for publicity concerning their various governmental functions. This is millions more than was being spent for this purpose a few years ago. I realize that you cannot cut it all out, but I believe that if the Appropriations Committee would do a little cutting here and there, a good share of this eighteen and one-half million dollars could be saved for the taxpayers of this country.

Mr. Chairman, let me repeat, that with our Government carrying the biggest debt in all of its history and with the need of the spending of billions of dollars more to provide for a proper defense, and since it is necessary thereby to add to the tax load of our Government, we ought to spend money only for those things that are absolutely necessary, and we ought to have the courage to reduce the expenditures to the minimum in every case where the funds are not absolutely needed at the present time.

Mr. Chairman, for the safe of the national defense of our country, and for the sake of its taxpayers, let us hold all other expenditures to the very minimum possible.

Mr. Chairman, Congress should not adjourn. It should stay in session during the impending crisis. In the meantime, it should take time to examine and investigate the items that are being appropriated by this Government, with a view of making such adjustments as are fair and reasonable in order that we may have sufficient funds to take care of our defense program. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1940, and June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, namely:

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for 5 minutes, primarily to make an announcement.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FISH. This is about a colleague.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. If the gentleman makes an announcement, he will start an argument.

Mr. FISH. No; this is not an argument.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. The gentleman is not going to start an argument?

Mr. FISH. No; I promise that. It is rather unusual, I admit.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. It would be unusual if the gentleman did not start an argument.

Mr. FISH. I agree with the gentleman, but this is the exception that proves the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH]?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, one of the outstanding and distinguished Members of this House who has given long, able, and faithful service in the House of Representatives was yesterday nominated on the Republican ticket for United States Senator in the State of Maine. [Applause.]

Mr. BREWSTER has served many years with us in the House. We know him as a Member of real ability. We also know that the State of Maine is a Republican stronghold, and that the nomination is almost equivalent to election, the same as nominations on the Democratic ticket in the South are equivalent to election.

We in the House will miss our colleague, who is popular with all of us. He has rendered a great service to his country here and to our deliberations. We know that he will continue to serve his country and his party and to use his legislative experience, training, and ability in the interest of the American people when he goes to the Senate of the United States. We say to him, "Hail and farewell;" but we hope that after he becomes a Member of that august body he will remember us, Democrats and Republicans alike, who sit in this humble part of the legislative branch of the Government. [Applause.]

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate very much the kind words of the gentleman from New York. I derived only one lesson from my recent experience which may bear upon the problem with which we are immediately faced. Many of us here have been concerned with what might be going on back home and with whether or not we should adjourn.

I do not presume that my record or my constituency are in any way unique, but I carried on a campaign without missing scarcely a session or a roll call. It seems evident that nothing would be more satisfactory to our constituents than to remain steadfastly here upon the job to which they have assigned us. This is the lesson I derived from this recent experience. I hope it may mean that Congress will continue in rather constant session and carry on the very grave responsibilities of keeping America and American democracy secure. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries and expenses: For an additional amount for salaries and expenses, Bureau of the Budget, fiscal year 1941, including the objects specified under this head in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1941, $50,000: Provided, That the limitation on the amount which may be expended under this head for temporary employment of persons or organizations by contract or otherwise without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes or the civil-service or classification laws is hereby increased to $100,000.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KNUTSON moves to strike out the paragraph beginning on page 5, line 17, and ending in line 25.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday in another body a distinguished gentleman rose and suggested a seven-point program for the rehabilitation of the United States. I would like to call these recommendations to the attention of the Members of the House because they are most extraordinary; in fact, were they adopted, it would, in effect, set up a dictatorship in this country as vicious as any they have across the sea.

The suggestions are as follows:

First. Confer upon the President full wartime power to prepare and defend America.

Second. Universal-defense service, so that every citizen may be best trained and placed for the country's defense.

Third. Confer upon the President power to suspend all rules, regulations, and statutes, including Army, Navy, and departmental seniority regulations, which, in his judgment, interfere with the maximum speed in the production, transportation, or manufacture of defense materials.

Fourth. Confer upon the President power to suspend the present debt limitation if, in his judgment, such limitation interferes with the maximum speed of the defense program.

Fifth. Grant the President the authority to aid in material or credit those countries and nations which, in his judgment, at this time constitute America's first line of defense.

Sixth. The President and the Congress to begin immediately the preparation and the adoption of a defense budget and a tax program adequate for the national defense.

Seventh. Confer on the President the power to take into custody for the duration of the defense effort all aliens whose freedom would, in his opinion, jeopardize the defense program.

I am wondering whether we are ready for a program of this kind in the United States.

Carried to its logical conclusion, it would suspend constitutional government. It would set up a military autocracy in this country, and I submit that we have already gone much too far in that direction already. It would make the President absolutely supreme in Budget making, in determining how much shall be spent, and also give him free rein insofar as the limit on the national debt is concerned. Then, too, he could place in confinement all who disagreed with his policies and actions.

I read the proposals of the distinguished gentleman with amazement and with deep concern, because he is looked upon and by many considered as a spokesman for the administration. I am wondering if the distinguished gentleman was sending up a trial balloon at the behest of the White House to give the President an indication of whether or not the Congress of the United States was continuing, as it has for the last 7 years, to be a servile, rubber stamp for the executive branch of the Government, and whether the time is propitious for the President to come out with a proposal to set up a dictatorship in this country. Judging by the past three Congresses and the past 7 years, it would not surprise me in the least if the Congress were to supinely surrender the few constitutional prerogatives it now retains and thus confer dictatorial powers upon the Executive. It would not surprise me in the least if the Executive were to ask for these extraordinary powers because he has a very exalted opinion of himself and his ability to rule without help from anyone. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

FOREST SERVICE

Reconstruction and repair of roads and other improvements, national forests in California: For the reconstruction of roads, trails, bridges, and other improvements in the national forests in California, damaged or destroyed by floods in February and March 1940, fiscal year 1940, $200,000, to remain available until December 31, 1940.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FISH: On page 22, after line 4, insert a new paragraph as follows:

"Rubber investigation: An investigation for the production of rubber in the Western Hemisphere, $1,000,000."

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I hope the members of the committee will give their attention to this proposal. The Secretary of Agriculture and the experts under him have made an extensive study as to the possibility of producing rubber in South America. I have had several talks with the Secretary himself. This proposal does not emanate from me. I am not interested at all in rubber of any kind. The Secretary of Agriculture, however, is vitally interested in this amendment and wants favorable action on it. In view of the fact that it is not in the bill I have taken occasion to present it. Just why I should be the spokesman for the Democratic Secretary of Agriculture I do not know, but I do know that several of his experts were sent down to my office by Secretary Wallace in favor of the proposal and proved to me the need and urgency for it.

I am talking directly to the Democrats, because if you Democrats do not want this project it will not be written into law because you control legislation. I am presenting the amendment on its merits and I think I can make a very sound case for it on its merits.

Secretary Wallace tells me there are 23,000,000 acres in South America available to grow rubber. He said we ought to find out the best acreage, where they have the proper amount of rainfall and the proper kind of soil, and we can then grow rubber in South America just as well as it is grown in the Malay States.

This is no little matter I am discussing, and I do hope the Members of the House will pay some attention to the facts that I am presenting and act accordingly.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. Is it not a fact that Ford is already producing rubber with a great degree of success now in Brazil?

Mr. FISH. The gentleman is correct. We are the greatest consumers of rubber in the world and the British Empire and Holland have a monopoly on this rubber. We pay outrageous prices for it. We consume, I think, something like 60 or 70 percent of it. Mr. Ford went down to South America 10 years ago and invested millions of dollars and has a huge plantation there. It takes 7 or 8 years to grow a rubber tree to the point where it will produce. Some people believe, in spite of what my distinguished friend from Michigan has said, that Mr. Ford did not make an adequate investigation of his location and that there is not proper rainfall there, although there is just across the mountain ranges.

The Secretary of Agriculture and his experts are absolutely convinced that there is ample and abundant acreage in South America to grow rubber, and they are supposed to be the best experts in the world.

I am informed that rubber originally came from South America and was transported to the East Indies where, under British control, it was intensely developed. So from every point of view, not alone of national defense, this is an important proposal. Some of our well-known international columnists have even suggested that we should go to war immediately in defense of ourselves because we do not have rubber and tin, and therefore we had better get into this war to safeguard a supply of these two essential commodities. If that is so, if there is a word of truth in it, my amendment should stand on its own merits. Congress should have acted 20 or 30 years ago under Republican administrations, because it is in the interest of the American people who are the consumers and we are being held up every year and highjacked on rubber prices because of a foreign monopoly, and right at our back door and on our own continent, we can grow rubber if we spend just a small sum of money to locate the most suitable land, soil, and rainfall in South America.

And, after all, if I am willing as a Republican to urge that $1,000,000 be placed in the hands of a Democratic Secretary of Agriculture, at least it shows my willingness to have this investigation held right away. Under ordinary conditions—not the emergency which confronts us—I would just as lief and would prefer to let it go until next year when we will have a new Secretary of Agriculture under a Republican administration to make this investigation. But putting aside partisanship, I feel it is in the interest of all the American people, and in the interest of national defense, and I would like to see the Members of Congress vote for this amendment on the merits of the proposal now, as time is of the essence. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 7 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, this whole subject of rubber is extremely interesting. It first came to my attention when I was on the subcommittee for agricultural appropriations, when we carried an item for rubber exploration. That first item was in 1933, and carried $75,000. We carried in excess of $46,000 a year every year up to and including the present appropriation bill for agriculture for 1940. I think you can examine all of the hearings, all of the testimony adduced by Dr. Auchter and you will find that we have made no real tangible progress. That is to say that Dr. Auchter and his assistants in the Department, took up the work where Mr. Edison left off his experimentations with goldenrod in the hope that there was enough rubber content to make it commercially feasible. However, that is not the case, and after an expenditure of $438,000 in the last 8 years, we have nothing definite to show.

Now there comes the experiment of Mr. Henry Ford in South America, and I shall quote from Time Magazine of June 17, 1940, eliminating wherever necessary for the sake of brevity. Mr. Ford's company went to South America in 1927 and took over 2,000,000 acres. There he started his rubber experimentation on a large scale, investing millions of dollars. Everything has gone along all right, except that all the rubber which Mr. Ford has produced in South America in all that time can be loaded into a single rubber factory in the United States of America. The first thing he ran into was a leaf difficulty. The leaves of the plant down there were susceptible to plant disease. Next, he had difficulty with native labor, and so, after 13 years of experimentation in Brazil on 2,000,000 acres, there is still little to show except a very modest production of rubber which is infinitesimal in comparison with our needs.

In our own country we tried it with guayule, this Mexican plant. Mr. Baruch and John D. Rockefeller, Jr., have expended millions of dollars in Texas. There they planted over 40,000 acres of guayule, and just as soon as the price of natural rubber went down, the production of guayule rubber went down to 3,000 pounds a year, and that is where it is at the present time, without hope of rehabilitating it, because of inherent difficulties involved.

I contend that our biggest hope is in the industrial field, even though there are drawbacks here also. There are many types of industrial rubber today. For instance, there is neoprene, which was first discovered by a professor at Notre Dame University. Next, there is Butadiene, manufactured by the Germans, today, and being used by them today to take the place of natural rubber. Then there is Thiokol, and the Goodrich Co.'s Koroseal. It is only within the last 2 or 3 weeks that the Goodrich Co. held an exposition in New York, and there they brought to the attention of the country a new type of synthetic rubber which they propose to use on the treads of rubber tires. They are getting the price down and they are going forward in their chemical research in the field of petroleum and the possibility of developing rubber from that source. They have announced a rubber known as Ameripol. That, in my judgment, Mr. Chairman, offers the greatest horizon for research and the possibility of developing rubber in case our supply from Dutch East Indies or the British is cut off.

I can see no virtue in the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH]. In the years past we have given the Department all of the money that they wanted for research, and nothing has been produced as yet in the way of real, tangible, commercial, merchantable, visible results. So why indulge in the gesture of putting another million dollars into the bill when, after 8 years of continuous and consistent effort, with all the money that they have asked of the subcommittee, there is still nothing to show, and I suggest that it is nothing more than a futile gesture. The proposal to put a million dollars into this bill for the purpose of carrying on rubber investigations should be turned down. I would rather lock to private industry. They are doing a good job now, particularly so in the light of the difficulties of the guayule plants in Texas, and in California because of difficulty in meeting present price competition.

So let us let industry work on it for a while. In proportion as they have found things in other fields of chemical enterprise and finally brought it within the reach of the average American pocketbook, I am satisfied that with that kind of inventive genius and resourcefulness they will find the answer in the field of rubber again.

So I respectfully suggest to the committee that the amendment offered by my friend from New York [Mr. FISH] ought to be voted down.

The last sentence of the Time article—page 72, June 17, 1940—is interesting. It observes that if Henry Ford cannot clean up the Brazilian jungle, only a concerted Government effort can.

Let me observe that such an effort would prove costly, indeed. An equal amount of money devoted to experimentation on the industrial front would be more likely to yield far greater results.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Observations, warnings, and general weather service: For an additional amount for establishing and maintaining a forecast district for New England, fiscal year 1941, including the same objects specified under the head "General weather service and research" in the Department of Agriculture Appropriation Act, 1940, $50,000.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAMBERTSON: On page 26, strike out the paragraph beginning with line 6.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, this is in line with the argument I made in general debate to strike out this $50,000 item for a separate weather bureau in Boston, on the ground that it is not a deficiency and it is not an emergency. The gentleman who followed me said he took pride in this. He said a Republican newspaper of Boston was one of the great advocates of this thing. It does not make any difference to me whether it is a Republican newspaper or what it is. It is a chamber of commerce idea, where Democrats and Republicans both join if they want some little gravy for their home city. That is very common. Republican newspapers and Democratic politicians will join many times to get something for their home community.

We ought to strike this out. No emergency; no deficiency. Of all people that should not be allowed to win a victory, it is a member of the Ways and Means Committee. The Ways and Means Committee has lagged a long time in this House to keep up with the already overburdened appropriations, and then for a member of the Ways and Means Committee to come over here and help sink us a little worse, we ought not to stand for it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Is it not true that a weather bureau at Boston near the coast is extremely important as a part of our national defense?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Nobody has intimated it as a part of national defense.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I do. I very strongly urge it.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. We can justify anything and everything now in the name of national defense. Somebody can figure out a connection for it all.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I yield.

Mr. MURRAY. Does not the gentleman know that Boston is a great city and does he not know they were able to get 1,900,000 pounds of fluid milk for that city, the only city in the United States that had it?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. No; I did not know that.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. Did the gentleman ever hear anything about parity payments?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Yes, sir; and I voted against them, too, just like you did. I dare you to vote against this with me. [Laughter.] I dare you to vote against this with me. Show me you are just as big as I have been and as unselfish on this item. You vote with me. I voted with you on parity payments. [Applause.]

Mr. GIFFORD. I will say to the gentleman that I have voted "no" so much that I do not know if I can break the habit. I am going to try.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I challenge everybody here to vote on this thing as his own conscience dictates. There is nobody who claims it is a deficiency. Nobody has proven it is an emergency. Yet here it it.

I have three towns in my district. One has a railroad shop that is about to be abandoned, and they want the Government to take it over. Another one has a furniture factory that has gone out. They wanted me to get the Government to take it over, but it never occurred to me to come here and ask my colleagues personally to help me get it taken care of in a deficiency bill or any bill to let the Government take them over. That had not occurred to me. But this is an accomplishment for a person of feelings without argument. It is all right for anybody to propose anything to you. I never object to that.

But it is also wrong for anybody to yield to an individual to personally raid the Federal Treasury.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, my good friend the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LAMBERTSON] and I are apt to see pretty much eye to eye on many problems that come before us. I am sorry in this instance that this is not the case. I believe that had it been possible for him to have heard in person the testimony of Commander Reichelderfer, Chief of the Weather Bureau, on this item, he would not take his present position in respect to it.

Mr. Chairman, I am supporting this item because I believe it to be justified in the light of our experience in recent years in New England and in the light of the testimony before our committee. I am supporting it also because I believe it will prove to be economy in the long run.

In this connection I call attention to the fact that the Chief of the Weather Bureau informed your committee that in a single instance this winter more than $5,000,000 was saved for the State of Florida as a result of Weather Bureau warning; an amount which he said would be sufficient to run the Florida frost-warning service for a hundred years to come on the basis of its present annual cost.

I have here, Mr. Chairman, a letter addressed to my colleague the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK], under date of June 15, by Mr. C. C. Clark, the Acting Chief of the Weather Bureau. He says among other things, and I quote:

The citizens residing in New England justly complain of the inadequacy of the weather forecast service now provided because the forecasts are now issued from the distant forecast center at Washington, D. C.

New England, because of its location, varied topography, and geographical features, presents forecast problems of a regional nature that require the application of special techniques based on an intimate knowledge of local conditions and their effect on weather occurrences. The territory comprising this district is crossed by two active storm paths and is affected both winter and summer not only by disturbances crossing the country from the west but also by coastal storms approaching from the south. It is impracticable, because of the large size of the Washington forecast district as now constituted, for the forecasters to give as intensive a detailed study to the changing weather conditions as is necessary.

If you look at the hearings on this item commencing at page 192, you will find further statements to the same effect by the Chief of the Weather Bureau. For example, and I quote:

The Washington district is still one of the largest districts, * * * and because of the differences in weather in New England, the special and individual needs of business and industrial interests there, and the large number of people to be served, it is very desirable for them to have a forecast district and a forecast center which can pay attention to their individualized needs. * * * The Washington district is just too large for any forecaster or group of forecasters to give specific and specialized forecasting for industry, agriculture, and other fields throughout the East. * * * A single forecaster cannot handle a district that large. It is simply impossible for him to study the local variations in weather and forecast them with the preciseness that he could if he were forecasting for a smaller area.

Commander Reichelderfer also stated that—

A forecaster at Boston could have interpreted the effects of the hurricane in New England better than the man in Washington because he could have devoted entire attention to the smaller area.

Mr. Chairman, New England, as we all know, had a hurricane during the last year or two which brought with it incalculable loss. New England has also had one or two other serious storms since that time. In none of these instances have we had adequate warnings from the Weather Bureau.

I believe that if this item is included in the bill New England should have a far better chance to avoid serious losses; that the expenditure made should result in very substantial economy in the long run.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. We all know that a great deal of damage and loss of life would have been saved if Boston had had a weather bureau at the time of the hurricane and flood in 1938. And also, is it not true that a great many pilots are going to be trained in that area in the near future?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Yes; that is true.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. As a matter of safety and also as a matter of national defense, we must have more adequate information about weather conditions in this area. Of course, a great many ships go in and out of the rivers and harbors in New England.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I think my colleague is right. Among other aviation projects which should be aided by the improved Weather Bureau service are the naval aviation base at Squantum, Mass., the new naval air base at Quonsett Point, R. I., and the new Army Northeast Air Base at Chickopee Falls, Mass. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas will be defeated.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, we do not want to give this particular item an exclusively Boston color, or even a Massachusetts color. I can assure the Members of the House that all of New England is vitally interested in having this important Weather Bureau service located, as it will be, in Boston. Outside of the arguments we have already heard advanced, I want to add one or two. Among the industries that will be served by this new weather station is that of fishing. Large fleets of fishing boats operate off the New England coast and off the coast of Canada. They depend on weather reports for planning their trips.

The question of national defense has been raised and I was rather surprised that my friend the gentleman from Kansas did not realize the importance of that area to the aviation industry through the experiments that are being conducted up there. As recently as Memorial Day I left Hartford in a plane, depending on weather reports received from the Weather Bureau 20 minutes before we left. The report was that everything was clear from Hartford to Washington, with a ceiling of not less than 1,500 feet into Washington. When we got to Philadelphia we had an 800-foot ceiling, and when we got to Baltimore we were on the ground with a four or five hundred foot ceiling. I came the rest of the way by automobile. That did not matter, with plenty of air fields in that part of the country, but as you go north from Boston, as my colleague from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] will bear me out, there are very few emergency landing fields and these weather reports are of vital importance. If one Army bomber, one of our flying fortresses, setting out from Washington, New York, or Boston to go north, and depending on the latest weather report, got information that did not stand up and met with a tragic crash, this $50,000 would be more than wiped out with that one accident.

I am not going to take the time of the Committee to refer to the effect on agriculture and all these other items, but I would like to say in the closing minutes that I do not believe there is any science connected with aviation that has improved so rapidly in the last few years as has the science of forecasting the weather.

I am going to ask to extend my own remarks and to include extracts from a report made by authorities at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. It was at that school that they discovered a method of not only measuring the width of a storm but also the depth of a storm. That one development added a great deal to accuracy in the science of weather forecasting. If this were a $50,000,000 item, I still feel the committee may have been justified in considering it. I am surprised there should be any debate on this $50,000 item when the benefits and results must be so apparent to all Members of the House as they were to the members of the Appropriations Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman may extend his own remarks in the RECORD, but to include extraneous matters he will have to receive permission in the House.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] for 3 minutes.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, it is a pleasure to vote "yes" on an appropriation. I am so often attempting to force reductions. The old Weather Bureau used to be called Old Probability—probably fair, probably something else. The old story is that out in Maryland an old farmer foretold the weather more accurately than the Weather Bureau here in Washington, and they sent an inspector to learn how he did it. He took the inspector out in the field and pointed to his donkey. He stated, "When the weather is good, he grazes contentedly. When bad weather is coming on he shows degrees of uneasiness and by that degree we determine the weather." They came back to Washington and they put a jackass at the head of every Weather Bureau in the country. That is a story that perhaps you have heard before. It was in our textbooks of long ago.

Today the forecasts are quite accurate. I live in the outermost section of the country and I would like to have the gentleman from Kansas City go with me on a small steamboat even to the islands not far away and if he did not get very seasick and disturbed about weather forecasts, then I should be very much mistaken.

We need this. We went through the hurricane in New England and realize the great need of this.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Would that Boston situation help me from being sick if I took that ride with the gentleman?

Mr. GIFFORD. The weather forecaster might warn you not to go. Many steamers would not attempt the trip if the Weather Bureau could more effectively function. Now, with flying added to these other methods of travel, we need this service more than ever before. I make no excuse for New England. New England contributes bountifully to this Nation and it is a little picayunish to be objecting to this minor appropriation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK] for 2 minutes.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I have already spoken on this matter, therefore my remarks will be brief at this time.

I call the attention of my colleagues to the fact that there is a district forecasting center at present in San Francisco, there is one at Denver, Colo.; Albuquerque, N. Mex.; Kansas City, Mo.; Chicago; New Orleans; Jacksonville, Fla.; and Washington, D. C. These stations serve wide areas. This is a district station, the same as these other eight.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Kansas City and Albuquerque are not $50,000 stations. They cost about half of that.

Mr. McCORMACK. Well, I have no argument with the gentleman on that. I am referring to the fact that they are district forecasting centers.

New England, as we all know, is the graveyard of maritime disasters. The gentleman from Connecticut referred to the fishing industry. New England is also a great maritime center. We have a northeast wind up there which changes very rapidly, which should be watched and followed closely.

Reference has been made to the fact that this item has not been thoroughly considered. It was considered by the Weather Bureau, it was recommended by the Department, and it has been personally investigated by the President himself. A special survey was made to determine whether or not this station was necessary for New England.

Mr. Chairman, I wish I could claim the credit for starting this, as the gentleman started out by saying, but I have to give credit where credit is due in order to be intellectually honest with myself. I give credit to the Boston Herald for originating this idea. The businessmen up there are all interested. As a matter of fact, last year in New York City there were over 12,000,000 telephone calls to the telephone company in connection with the weather, which shows the interest in only one city. I have no objection, unlike my friend from Kansas, to other district offices being established where recommended. While I think the opposition of my friend from Kansas, as far as New England is concerned, is in absolute good faith, nevertheless it is without a recognition of the commanding facts which warrant the establishment of this station.

Mr. LEWIS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS of Ohio. Does the gentleman know that in the hearings on this matter Commander Reichelderfer, the head of the Weather Bureau, has this to say on page 195 of the hearings——

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LAMBERTSON] read that this morning.

Mr. LEWIS of Ohio. That it had nothing to do with the origination of this project.

Mr. McCORMACK. Origination is one thing, and having nothing to do with passing on it is another thing. I took it up personally with the Director of the Weather Bureau myself, and I have a letter here from the Acting Director, dated only the other day, which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH] referred to, showing that they are absolutely for this. I agree that originating is one thing, and having knowledge is another, and the letter of June 15 of the Acting Director clearly shows support of this station.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHORT. The gentleman from Kansas lives as near Kansas City as I do, and since we have a station in Missouri I welcome the opportunity to vote to give you one in Boston.

Mr. McCORMACK. That is a noble and a statesmanlike attitude to state. [Laughter and applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LAMBERTSON].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LAMBERTSON) there were—ayes 13, noes 80.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, some months ago there came before this House a bill to include cotton within the provisions of the Federal Crop Insurance Act. That bill also contained a provision to increase the administrative expenses of the Federal Crop Insurance Corporation from $6,000,000 to $12,000,000. Despite my feeble eloquence that bill passed by a vote of 200 to 113, but I contended at the time that the thing was entirely experimental and that the Federal Treasury was going to suffer as a consequence of that experiment on the basis of what was disclosed up to that moment. Now, it is rather singular that the largest supplemental item in this bill today is an item to provide for additional subscriptions to the capital stock of the Federal Crop Insurance Corporation in the sum of $20,000,000, and if you can read a balance sheet or if you can properly read the item in this bill you might know full well that they are restoring their capital structure to the extent of $20,000,000 to get ready for the losses in 1941.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. TABER. This $20,000,000 is just a drop in the bucket compared with what is coming.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I agree with the gentleman.

Now, read the testimony. For the 1939 crop-year the loss was $2,150,000 on wheat alone and the Chairman of the Crop Insurance Corporation comes before the deficiency committee and states that the minimum loss on wheat will be $14,000,000 for the year 1940.

The Treasury pays all the administrative expenses. Come other years and other losses and by that time we shall have been fully persuaded that this is only an experiment and a very tragic and costly experiment at that. I recur to the record, and I recall, refreshing my memory this morning on the observation made by our friend from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON], when in the course of the argument trying to include cotton within the provisions of the Crop Insurance Act, he said, "The hearings disclose that the operations in wheat have been satisfactory." Yes; they have—satisfactory to the extent of $2,000,000 in losses in 1939; $14,000,000 of losses in 1940; and fate knows what in 1941. Yes; the operations have been satisfactory. They have been costly, and there is no immediate prospect that it will be self-sustaining. The present actuarial basis for crop insurance should be reexamined, and if it appears that crop insurance at a more moderate premium is not workable, some other remedy should be considered.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FISH: On page 26, after line 12, insert "Tin smelter: For the erection of a tin smelter in the United States, $1,000,000."

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not authorized by law.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman let me continue for about 3 minutes?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I reserve the point of order, Mr. Chairman, for 3 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia reserves the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman is correct. This is not germane, probably, to the bill, as it is legislation on an appropriation bill and not authorized by law. The Committee on Rules gave a rule for a tin investigation. I do not believe that is at all necessary, having served for a number of years on a subcommittee of the Foreign Affairs Committee investigating tin. We went very thoroughly into the subject, and we came to the very definite conclusion—in fact, unanimously—that what we really need is a tin smelter in the United States in order to refine tin ore from Bolivia.

I take this opportunity to present these facts to the Congress because we use something like 60 percent of all the tin in the world. We are held up on the price of tin because we have no smelter here. We have to buy the refined tin from England and Holland, which have a monopoly and charge monopoly prices.

We can break this monopoly with $1,000,000 by erecting a tin smelter in the United States, and probably save from ten to twenty million dollars a year.

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. DIMOND. Have we not a tin smelter at the present time in New Jersey? I have been told there is one there and that Bolivian tin has been smelted there.

Mr. FISH. We have not a workable tin smelter in New Jersey. Perhaps it should be there. There was one there some years ago, but if we had a modern tin smelter in the United States we would save from ten to twenty million dollars a year, and as everyone is now talking in terms of national defense, and as we need tin for our armaments, I think it would be money well spent. In addition, our industries consume a great amount of tin, particularly in the use of tin cans. This would be in the nature of an economy for our consumers.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. BLOOM. The tin smelter in New Jersey is only an experimental smelter, experimenting with a new process of smelting tin, but that smelter could not supply anywhere near what we need.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I admit that the point of order lies against the proposed amendment, but I hope that the Members of Congress will see the necessity of having a tin smelter in the United States for purposes of national defense.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Menominee Indians in Wisconsin: The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to withdraw from the Treasury of the United States during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, the sum of $105,000 of any funds on deposit to the credit of the Menominee Indians in Wisconsin, and to expend such sum, or as much thereof as may be necessary, for making a per capita payment of $50 to each enrolled member of the Menominee Tribe, such per capita payments to be made in four equal monthly installments during July, August, September, and October, 1940: Provided, That such per capita payment shall be in lieu of the payments authorized by the act of June 15, 1934 (48 Stat. 964), for the fair market stumpage value of timber cut on the Menominee Reservation during the fiscal years 1940 and 1941: Provided further, That the amounts expended for making such per capita payment shall be reimbursed to the tribal funds utilized therefor from sums that would otherwise be paid such Indians pursuant to the act of June 15, 1934, supra.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MURRAY: Page 27, line 20, strike out the word "four" and insert the word "two", and on page 27, strike out the word "August" and insert "and October" and before the word "September", insert the word "and".

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Emergencies arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service: For an additional amount to enable the President to meet unforeseen emergencies arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service, and to extend the commercial and other interests of the United States and to meet the necessary expenses attendant upon the execution of the Neutrality Act, to be expended pursuant to the requirement of section 291 of the Revised Statutes (31 U. S. C. 107), fiscal year 1941, $1,000,000; of which $50,000 shall, in the discretion of the President, be available for personal services in the District of Columbia.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I rise to inquire of the chairman of the subcommittee whether or not in this particular item of $1,000,000 for Diplomatic Service there is anything to compensate any particular Foreign Service officer for damages done to their personal household goods in the recent war in Poland? My attention has been called to a bill introduced in the Senate to pay Anthony Biddle, former Ambassador to Poland, the sum of $243,361 out of our Treasury for some alleged damage to some of his household goods.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEFAN. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM].

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. This is not available for the purpose the gentleman inquires about.

Mr. STEFAN. I am glad to be reassured by the chairman that none of the money in this appropriation for "emergencies arising in diplomatic and consular service" can be used for the purposes of any such indemnification. I am not so sure, however, that I share the thought of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] as to whether or not this appropriation could be used for this purpose as I am advised that this fund is available without restriction for any unforeseen emergencies that the President may decide to use the fund for.

I do feel confident, however, that the Secretary of State would not permit this appropriation which is not audited by the Comptroller General to be availed of for any such purpose.

Mr. Chairman, I have frequently spoken here on behalf of the Department of State and our Foreign Service because of my membership on the subcommittee which makes appropriations for the State Department. I believe we have a well-managed State Department and that we have many good Foreign Service officers. I say now and have said before that this service is our first line of defense and is just as important for the defense of America as is our Army and Navy.

I am not making an attack on Mr. Biddle personally. I do not know him. My friends on the Foreign Relations Committee tell me he is a fine gentleman and a good officer. So far as I personally know, he is not a career man and has been in the service a very short time. I do not know under what circumstances he left his post in Poland nor under what circumstances he bases his claim to $243,361 of funds in our Treasury. I am told that he is a very rich man and is not in need of funds. I am told that he is now employed as sort of an Assistant Ambassador in France. All I am interested in is the condition of our Treasury and our taxpayers in this very dark hour. I feel Mr. Biddle's demand for this money is unreasonable. I want the record to show that Congress knows of this bill and also that we do not want any of the funds we are now appropriating in this last deficiency bill to go toward the payment of this unreasonable claim.

While I have not had the opportunity, because this matter has just been called to my attention, to contact the Department of State, I am confident that they would never lend their endorsement to such a raid on our Treasury as is proposed in the bill introduced in the Senate by Senator GUFFEY. We are not niggardly in our appropriations to Mr. Biddle, and our other ambassadors. We pay for their transportation and the transportation of their entire families to and from their posts. We give them heat allowances, rent allowances; we give them allowances to make up the difference in the cost of living where they are as compared to the cost of living in the United States; we pay them in gold so there is no loss of exchange, and in addition to all their perquisites we give them allowances for entertainment and representation; and do not forget, we also pay for the transportation of all their household goods both ways. All of this, in addition to their salaries, which in the case of Mr. Biddle, is $17,500 per year.

If we are to embark upon a policy of compensating everyone for any personal loss that they might sustain as a result of their contact with hostilities we would have to be consistent and pay for the loss of every tooth brush and pocket comb that any of our citizens might sustain as the result of the conditions which exist in Europe at this time. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION, UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN

Salaries and expenses: For an additional amount for salaries and expenses, International Joint Commission, United States and Great Britain, fiscal year 1941, including the objects specified under the appropriation for such purpose in the State Department Appropriation Act, 1941, and including also the salary of one commissioner on the part of the United States, notwithstanding the provision to the contrary contained in such act, who shall serve at the pleasure of the President, $7,500.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the paragraph on page 43, beginning in line 1 and ending in line 11.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Transportation of bullion and coin: For an additional amount for transportation of bullion and coin, between mints, assay offices, and bullion depositories, including compensation of temporary employees, fiscal year 1940, $1,608,000, to remain available until June 30, 1941.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TABER: Page 50, line 20, strike out "$1,608,000" and insert "$1,450,000."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered to reduce the amount available for the transportation of gold from New York to Fort Knox by $158,000. This is a very small reduction, but it serves to protest against the crazy program we have had for the last 7 years of buying gold at $35 an ounce and putting it under the ground where it is no good to the country. If we are ever going to stop this proposition, we have got to begin to refuse to appropriate money for that purpose.

I hope this amendment will be adopted.

In addition to that, it would seem as if they could save that amount of money out of the appropriation without the slightest difficulty. I hope this amendment will be adopted and we can save a little money.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I had proposed, until my colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] offered this amendment, to offer a somewhat similar amendment, but going further, reducing the amount from $1,608,000 to $1,000,000, or a reduction of $608,000, whereas the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] would reduce it $250,000.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that that is a rather large sum of money—$1,608,000—to transfer gold from one section of the United States to the other, and that we might very well economize, justifiably, by asking the Army to use some of its trucks or mule trains and work out this transportation problem. If we ever enter into war, one of the greatest problems will be that of transportation.

We might very well say to the Army General Staff, "Why not work out this problem and save us some money? You might put to work your mule trains and trucks that have little to do in peacetimes." We might use that mule train from Death Valley that was here in Washington the other day and save some money in the transportation of this gold to be buried out in the State of Kentucky.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. Why can we not use W. P. A. labor in the transportation of this gold?

Mr. FISH. I think that is an excellent idea. Why not give them something actually to do of benefit to our country and save us some money? I think we would find we could save the amount of money suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. KNUTSON. Well, we might give it to Hopkins to play with. He would get rid of it in a hurry.

Mr. FISH. Certainly somebody is going to play with this money. We do not need this huge amount of money to bury gold in the ground. To my way of thinking, that is the greatest single fiasco of the New Deal. It is the height of all New Deal follies—the purchasing of gold at $35 an ounce where it costs $18 or $19 to produce it in South Africa and $10 an ounce in Soviet Russia, and we pay three times the cost of production to the Russians and twice the cost of production to South Africans for gold which they take out of the ground and we transport it over here and then we bury it back into the ground, where is serves no useful purpose, where it draws no interest, where it feeds nobody, where it clothes nobody, where it puts nobody to work, and does not in any way solve any of our problems, but rather hinders international trade and forces other nations into the barter system which the President denounced yesterday.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I willingly yield to the gentlewoman from Illinois.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. The gentleman is a distinguished expert on peace. Does he not think it endangers our peace having so much gold right in the center of the United States, where every potential enemy would know about it and be anxious to get it?

Mr. FISH. It encourages all of the nations of the world to gang up on the United States and to rob us if they can. It is our duty, therefore, to see that we have the greatest navy in the world to protect this gold. So we not only pay twice the cost of production for this useless metal, but we will have to have a navy twice as big to protect it and the United States. I think the gentlewoman from Illinois is quite correct in her logic, as she generally is.

Now, this amendment is seriously offered by my distinguished colleague from New York. I regret he did not go further and try to economize more than $250,000, but let us economize at least that amount and see if we cannot put some of these agencies to work transporting this useless gold and save $250,000 at least. It is worth while once in a while even to try to save such a relatively small amount as $250,000. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment close in 2 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from New York was, as he frankly said, offered as a protest against the policy of the United States Government of buying gold.

The adoption of the amendment would not settle any such policy. It could not be settled by withholding funds that are asked for the purpose of moving the gold; nor would it settle any policy by holding up the funds. All they would do would be to move as much as they could and leave the rest in the vaults in New York where they say it is not prudent to leave it.

As appears from page 354 of the hearings the Post Office Department receives a fee of $180 per $1,000,000 for shipping gold from New York to Fort Knox. The estimated cost of moving this bullion from the New York Assay Office to the Fort Knox bullion depository totals $1,608,000, including the services of laborers and guards.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. Why could not this gold be melted down into ingots so heavy that it would be impossible for anyone to carry it off?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. It is in bars.

Mr. FISH. What the gentleman means is that it should be melted down into the form of a golden calf so it could be worshiped.

Mr. KNUTSON. I would rather have a golden bull. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. The gentleman from Minnesota is facetious. I am trying to talk on the record. This is an important matter to the Treasury. Withholding the funds will merely prevent them from shipping the gold. The Treasury Department does not feel that it is wise to leave it where it is. I do believe the Congress ought not to take the responsibility of leaving it in New York. The Fort Knox depository was established especially for this purpose.

I hope the amendment will be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TABER) there were—ayes 60, noes 82.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLAND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 104104, the second deficiency bill, directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and the amendment to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WAR DEPARTMENT CIVIL FUNCTIONS APPROPRIATION BILL, 1941—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. SNYDER submitted the following conference report and statement on the bill (H. R. 8668) making appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, for civil functions administered by the War Department, and for other purposes:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate and amendments of the House to certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8668) making appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, for civil functions administered by the War Department, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, and 11.

Amendment numbered 21: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 21, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 22: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22, and agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate and certain amendments of the House to certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8668) making appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, for civil functions administered by the War Department, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended as to each of such amendments, namely:

On amendment No. 3: Strikes out the proposals of the Senate (a) to increase by $28,000,000 the $21,000,000 previously authorized to be appropriated for the Arkansas River Basin flood-control project, and (b) to increase by $13,000,000 the $25,000,000 previously authorized to be appropriated for the White River Basin flood-control project.

On amendment No. 4: Strikes out the proposal of the Senate to modify previously authorized flood-control projects at Hartford and East Hartford, Conn., and Springfield, West Springfield, Chicopee, Holyoke, and Northampton, Mass.

On amendment No. 5: Strikes out the proposal of the Senate to make the appropriation in the bill for "flood control, general," available for flood-control work on Ontauga Creek at Prattville, Ala.

On amendment No. 6: Strikes out the appropriation of $249,000 proposed by the Senate for prosecuting work on the flood-control project at East Hartford, Conn., in accordance with revised plans and cost estimates.

On amendment No. 8: Strikes out the proposal of the Senate to increase by $1,844,000 the authorized cost of the Sacramento River flood-control works.

On amendment No. 11: Strikes out the legislation proposed by the Senate with respect to the Savannah River and Clark Hill Reservoir project.

On amendments Nos. 21 and 22, relating to the employment of aliens in the Panama Canal Zone: Adopts the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate, thus making the provision identical with provisions incorporated in the regular annual Army and Navy appropriation bills for 1941, already enacted.

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the conference report on the bill H. R. 8668, the War Department civil functions appropriation bill, 1941.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, my understanding is that the Senate conferees yielded to the House position upon every amendment which was in disagreement, and that that is what the conference report results in.

Mr. SNYDER. That is correct, exactly.

Mr. TABER. For that reason I have agreed that I would not object to the gentleman's bringing it up at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ELECTION CONTEST—JOHN R. NEAL v. ESTES KEFAUVER

Mr. BELL, from the Committee on Elections No. 1, submitted the following privileged resolution, House Resolution 534 (Rept. No. 2609), which was read, referred to the House Calendar, and ordered printed:

House Resolution 534 (Report No. 2609)

Resolved, That John R. Neal is not entitled to a seat in the House of Representatives of the Seventy-sixth Congress from the Third Congressional District of the State of Tennessee.

Resolved, That ESTES KEFAUVER is entitled to a seat in the House of Representatives of the Seventy-sixth Congress from the Third Congressional District of the State of Tennessee.

MAINTENANCE OF MONROE DOCTRINE

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 525, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of House Joint Resolution 556, a joint resolution approving nonrecognition of the transfer of any geographic region in the Western Hemisphere from one non-American power to another non-American power, and providing for consultation with other American republics in the event that such transfer should appear likely. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the joint resolution and shall continue not to exceed 2 hours to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the joint resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the joint resolution for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. Speaker, there is nothing unusual about the rule that we have called up. It makes in order a rather important bill reported by the Foreign Affairs Committee dealing with the Monroe Doctrine.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I have for many years served with the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM], chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. He is my distinguished chairman. He has devoted much of his time, ability, and almost his very life to reviving the memory of George Washington and his sayings, to such an extent that back in his own district it is a disputed question whether George Washington wrote the Farewell Address or the gentleman from New York, SOL BLOOM. He has served his country well, and he wants to continue to serve it well. He wants to revive the Monroe Doctrine, so that the people not only of this country but of the whole world will know the wording of the Monroe Doctrine.

He has introduced—I assume at the request of the administration—this resolution which reaffirms the Monroe Doctrine. The only change I can see in the resolution is that it will have the effect merely of reiterating the Monroe Doctrine and changing the title from the Monroe Doctrine to the Monroe-Bloom Doctrine. I think some Members of the House, particularly those on my side, are unduly alarmed about this resolution. We are making a mountain out of a molehill. As I look at the resolution, its sole purpose is to reaffirm an ancient doctrine of our country in this world emergency so that European nations will know that the transfer of possessions by one non-American nation to another non-American nation is against the policy of the United States as written specifically into the Monroe Doctrine. All we are doing by act of Congress is to reassert this doctrine and to show the world that not only the President, representing the executive branch of the Government, but the Congress of the United States stand squarely behind that doctrine, particularly about the nontransfer of European possessions in America from one European nation to another.

No man in this country knows more about Latin American affairs than Sumner Welles, the distinguished Under Secretary of State. He told me over the telephone yesterday that the language of article II in this bill in no way modifies or limits the power of the United States to act under its traditional policy, but at the same time recognizes the inter-American agreements into which the United States has entered with its neighbors, and fully takes into account the complete solidarity of all the American republics in this regard. I point out again that he states that this in no way modifies or limits the power of the United States to act under its traditional policies.

Mr. Speaker, I want to quote directly from the Monroe Doctrine. It is not surprising that some people are not familiar with the Monroe Doctrine because it was written so many years ago. You cannot expect the American people to know exactly what is in it. You cannot expect Members of Congress or even members of the Foreign Affairs Committee to know the precise language of the Monroe Doctrine. I submit that is true, and I could easily prove it by making reference to something that happened in the committee. Now, how can we possibly expect foreign nations to know the specific language of the Monroe Doctrine?

I propose to take a little time here to read extracts from that famous traditional American document.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. As the gentleman goes along, will he explain to the House wherein the Bloom doctrine disagrees with the Monroe Doctrine?

Mr. FISH. There is no disagreement at all, except that we are bringing it up to date so that it will have the additional privilege of having Mr. BLOOM's name on it.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BLOOM. I think the gentleman has gone far enough. If the gentleman wants to be funny I think he ought to go on the stage and not resort to small tricks like this.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman has been unduly alarmed. I want to give him a little credit, and I mean exactly every word I say, and I mean it in the kindliest of spirit. The gentleman ought to be congratulated. I would be glad to take the gentleman's place, and he can put my name on the bill. I would love to have it there. That is the only difference, I may say to the gentleman from Minnesota. I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM] ought to be proud to have his name on it. I assure him I am not trying to ridicule him at all.

Mr. BLOOM. I am proud of having my name on any bill presented to this House, but I am not proud of having anyone get up on the floor and try to make fun and ridicule over a matter that is most serious. The whole world is looking to the Congress today to see what it is going to do. It is very unbecoming of any Member of this House to do such a despicable thing, and I resent it.

Mr. FISH. I think the gentleman has a perfect right to resent it, if he wants to take it that way. Some of us are apt to be facetious once in a while. I was indirectly trying to give the gentleman credit and I hope he will take it in that way.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. The gentleman is aware of the fact—I do not know whether the House is or not—that this resolution was introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM], chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, contemporaneously with a similar bill in the Senate by the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee [Mr. PITTMAN]. The Senate on yesterday passed this resolution by a unanimous vote of 76 to 0.

Mr. FISH. This is an administration measure; certainly; and one that is very important and ought to be very carefully considered.

The Monroe Doctrine, in part, reads this way:

> The political system of the Allied Powers is essentially different in this respect from that of America. This difference proceeds from that which exists in their respective governments. And to the defense of our own, which has been achieved by the loss of so much blood and treasure, and matured by the wisdom of their most enlightened citizens, and under which we have enjoyed unexampled felicity, this whole Nation is devoted.
>
> We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system—

That is the point—> to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere. * * *

> Our policy in regard to Europe * * * remains the same, which is, not to interfere in the internal concerns of any of its powers; to consider the government de facto as the legitimate government for us; to cultivate friendly relations with it, and to preserve those relations by a frank, firm, and manly policy, meeting in all instances the just claims of every power, submitting to injuries from none.

This is the conclusion I want to emphasize particularly, in this great emergency with which we are confronted, with a world aflame with war, with many Americans who want to intervene and who want to ease or force the United States into war, let us turn back on this occasion to the words and the advice of Monroe and see what he and the statesmen of those days had to say:

> In the wars of European powers—

This is written in the Monroe Doctrine, and what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander—

> In the wars of the European powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparations for our defense.

So the Monroe Doctrine today, as it was then written and has not been changed, advised us that we should continue to be opposed to meddling in the foreign affairs of European nations; in other words, that we want America for Americans and Europe for Europeans, and that is a good American doctrine.

For 120 years or more it has been the traditional American doctrine, and yet we find in the United States internationalists and interventionists who would plunge us headlong into war over matters that do not concern us and over forms of government in foreign lands. Today we are reasserting the Monroe Doctrine, saying that we will look with suspicion upon and oppose the transfer of possessions owned by foreign nations in America to other foreign nations; that we are opposed to the invasion of the American Continent by any foreign foe or foreign nation or that armed forces, but at the same time we reiterate that we are opposed ourselves to mixing in or interfering or meddling with the foreign policies of other governments.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will not the gentleman inform the House, if and when Germany should be ceded those foreign possessions and she lays claim to them, although we say we will not recognize that, what will we do?

Mr. FISH. I am in favor of this resolution, and I am going to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. GIFFORD. Do not dodge it.

Mr. FISH. I will not dodge it. I have no idea of dodging it at all. I am in favor of this resolution because I believe not only in the Monroe Doctrine and in reiterating the Monroe Doctrine and letting the people know exactly what it it, but because I believe this is a step in the direction of peace.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] has asked an important question and that question is what will we do if some foreign nation should ignore our protests that we are about to enact into law. My answer to him is simply this. The President is asking for this reaffirmation by Congress of the doctrine so there can be no misunderstanding, because we have had very unhappy experiences abroad since at one time the President of the United States speaks for one policy and the Senate or the House or the Congress repudiates that policy. Thus the Congress of the United States reasserts the Monroe Doctrine and makes known to the world exactly what it is.

And I submit to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] that if we go on record for this resolution we are serving notice on the world that the President and the Congress are united [applause] and that we are opposed to the transfer of any of these islands off our coast, and that applies to all foreign nations. Nobody knows who will win this war, but suppose Germany and Italy should win it, and they should take these islands now belonging to France or England. We are going on record today that we are opposed to it and I submit that this is a peace gesture, that this is a step toward peace, because I believe that if these foreign nations know in advance that the United States is united and determined to uphold the Monroe Doctrine and will oppose any foreign nation transferring or taking these islands, no nation in the world will attempt to do it or would come over here looking for trouble. That in itself, I think, will keep us out of war.

Mr. GIFFORD. But just what would we do?

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts wants to know what the Congress of the United States would do if some foreign nation should seize an island off our coast. I have already said that I do not believe any nation would dare to do so in defiance of the act of Congress, and the reiteration of the Monroe Doctrine, but if any nation is so foolhardy as to come over here and seize an island off our coast in defiance of an act of Congress and the Monroe Doctrine, and should continue to keep it and would not arbitrate, then I believe we should enforce the Monroe Doctrine and go to war if necessary in defense of our own interests. Otherwise, if you do not intend to do that, do not let us pass this resolution. If you Members of Congress do not believe in the Monroe Doctrine and upholding it by force, then let us not pass this resolution. I believe in the Monroe Doctrine and I am sure Democrats and Republicans alike support it. But if you believe in it and vote for it you may have to fight for it and defend it, and if necessary, go to war to uphold it, and I am prepared for that eventuality.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. In the event that a foreign power did take one of the islands, what is there to arbitrate?

Mr. FISH. If they should do it under a misunderstanding or misapprehension, there is always a possibility of resorting to arbitration. If you take this action today I venture to state, from what I know of foreign diplomacy, that no nation will dare to do it, because no nation or group of nations wants war with the United States. If we are merely going through a gesture, I would much rather not bring the resolution up. I am supporting it because I think to take this step now is just like making an offer in a business deal or a warning. We indicate that we mean what we say, and if we mean what we say we should be ready to defend it by force, if necessary.

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. PATRICK. I am delighted with the gentleman's statement in every respect, except the one thing in which he says if it is done and then we cannot arbitrate we will enforce it by war. It seems to me that that shows a little weakness there, and I am delighted to have it from the gentleman that it can be said strongly and stanchly by the United States, without any quibbling, that the minute the foot is set down and the doctrine is violated we will enforce it by war, if necessary.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield first to the gentleman from Connecticut, a member of the committee.

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact, in a dozen or more instances involving nontransfer our vocal opposition has been enough. It has deterred not only Germany but England and France, and one of the essences of the Doctrine is that we keep the threat vague. I would not want to go on record saying what I would do, but the very vagueness of the Doctrine has been its strength throughout its age.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Is it not also true that the purpose of this resolution is to prevent war rather than to cause war? We have the precedent in 1811, when foreign powers were about to take countries down to the south of us, that the House and the Senate passed a similar resolution, giving notice that we would not recognize such action, and as a result of that resolution by the Congress, no action was taken by foreign powers. It will also give notice that we propose to follow the traditional policy of 150 years if we pass this resolution and also follow the warning given in President Madison's administration in 1811.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman is correct. I do not believe that America, representing the greatest and most powerful nation in the world, wants to adopt any craven or cowardly policy. If you Members of Congress do not mean what you say in reaffirming your faith in the Monroe Doctrine and are not willing to carry it out and enforce it, then it would be much better not to consider this resolution. However, as far as I am concerned, when I vote for this resolution I propose to back it up by force, and I want the world to know it, and if they know it the United States will never be attacked or Latin America will not be invaded.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 2 additional minutes.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman that there are some things for which the American people will fight, and the Monroe Doctrine is one of them.

Mr. FISH. And they will not pussyfoot or compromise on it. Otherwise we are just making a gesture which is meaningless to the world and utterly futile and will make us ridiculous. If we are not ready to defend the Monroe Doctrine today and to back it up, let us drop it immediately. As a Republican Member that is my only purpose in supporting it, and none other.

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. SHANLEY. It was your distinguished ancestor, Secretary Fish, who, with General Grant, wrote this nontransfer doctrine, and he said what to me is more significant than anything else that has ever been written, because the nontransfer doctrine is not in the Monroe Doctrine—it is an adaptation——

Mr. FISH. Interpreted from it.

Mr. SHANLEY. Yes. He said then that this hemisphere must be wholly American. To me that means that every one of these island dependencies must have an opportunity to be American. If I emphasize any words it is "wholly American." That is the basis of the nontransfer doctrine.

Mr. FISH. Now, I hope my good friend from New York [Mr. BLOOM] will realize that I was attempting to be a little facetious and perhaps too overhumorous in a kindly way to give him the credit which he deserves as chairman of the committee. I want the House to understand that. [Applause.]

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. BLOOM. I can assure the gentleman that I have no ill feeling against him at all, but when a Member speaks from his seat and tries to be facetious about such a matter, I think it is carrying things a little too far.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. The gentleman naturally cannot blame me for that. I yield myself another minute, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HARTER of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. HARTER of New York. Will the gentleman explain to us this point: This contemplates objection to the transfer of any of these dependencies. What would happen, if this resolution is passed, if the mother country should absolutely go out of existence? What would we be forced to do under this resolution?

Mr. FISH. I am going to answer the gentleman in this way, and it is what I wanted to say in conclusion: I believe there is a corollary to this resolution, and I hope the Committee on Foreign Affairs in its meeting tomorrow may give it their approval. It seemed to me in these days when we are trying to provide adequate national defense, it is the duty of the President and the Congress to buy all of these islands from Greenland to South America, off our coast, and have them in our own possession. That would solve this problem. For purposes of national defense alone, for air bases, for submarine bases, and for naval bases, they are badly needed for national defense. They were not needed 50 years ago when we had no airplanes or submarines, but they are essential today for the defense of our shores. It will cost us money. We will lose money, but we will gain by adequate national defense. I submit now, with the world involved in war, the President of the United States ought to be requested by Congress to buy every single island off our shores from Greenland down to South America.

Mr. HARTER of New York. If the mother country goes out of existence what will happen with regard to these dependencies in the Western Hemisphere, if we pass this resolution?

Mr. FISH. France has 4 islands in the Western Hemisphere—Guadeloupe, Martinique, and 2 little islands near Canada, and French Guiana. That is why I am so anxious to have the President do it. France owes us billions of dollars. I would even pay them gold—a part of the utterly useless gold buried out in the State of Kentucky. I would give them that gold, give them 20 times what they are worth, to buy all of these French and British islands now before any peace treaty is written on the other side, but even then I think that Germany does not have any idea of coming here, and we could buy them from Germany if we passed this resolution and let them know that we mean to uphold and defend the Monroe Doctrine.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 1 additional minute.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. The proposal has come this afternoon from my district that we also buy the French Navy and pay them for that, rather than have it go into other hands. Would you include that in the purchase of the islands?

Mr. FISH. Well, I do not think I would do that, because I think the purchase of any navy is contrary to international law. I am very much opposed to selling our destroyers, because that is also contrary to American traditions, international law, and our own law.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I know the gentleman is intensely interested in the acquisition of French and British islands——

Mr. FISH. And peace.

Mr. RANDOLPH. And peace; certainly. Does not the gentleman believe that the President's entering into negotiation with these countries as he has suggested would not be an act of pressing down our heel upon these two sister democracies, but would really be helping them and at the same time give us adequate national defense?

Mr. FISH. Of course, it would be helping them. I would like to see the favorable action on the resolution introduced by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] to buy these islands.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself the balance of the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 4 minutes.

Mr. FISH. Not only are these islands of no particular value or advantage to any of these foreign nations unless they want to attack us—and none of them do—but we do not want those political systems which the Monroe Doctrine talks about brought over near our coasts. There is possibly some justifiable criticism of the President. I do not know why the President has not already acted, but if it is necessary I believe the Congress should request him to act and assure him that we will make adequate appropriations to purchase those islands. It will solve peacefully a lot of future problems that may grow up out of this war.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The gentleman from New York remembers, of course, that in the naval authorization bill specific provision was given for the Secretary of the Navy to negotiate and purchase island bases in cooperation and consultation with the Department of State and the Department of War.

Mr. FISH. I am very sorry I had overlooked that. Does that exist in the law?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Yes; it does. The naval expansion bill authorized the Secretary of the Navy in cooperation with the Department of War and Department of State to acquire bases outside continental United States.

Mr. FISH. Those are bases. I meant to acquire political possession of the islands.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. That applies also to possession of the islands. Ten thousand dollars was set apart for that purpose.

Mr. FISH. I cannot agree with the gentleman. There has been a lot of criticism of Col. Charles Lindbergh, but certainly Lindbergh has been right in many things. He was right about the weakness of the Soviet aviation and was right about the strength of the German aviation. He also said we should buy aviation bases in Latin America or we should negotiate for aviation bases in Latin America. I think that should be done. If the Secretary of the Navy has that power, I think he should exercise it immediately.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Under this Bloom Monroe-Doctrine resolution, if the international warmongers take their gold and the British Fleet over to Canada, shall we have to send our American boys to slaughter to defend these international warmongers who no doubt will run away from England to Canada the same as they ran away from Norway, Belgium, France, and other countries when the fighting got hot?

Mr. FISH. No; this is a peace measure. On the other hand, if the gentleman wants to ask me the question, I would regard the invasion of Canada as a violation of the Monroe Doctrine and of this resolution; and I believe that the American people are prepared to defend Canada against invasion by any foreign power.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Would the gentleman hold that if the international warmongers who now have control of the British Government came over here to Canada and set up their government in Canada, that under the Monroe Doctrine we are bound to get into the war and slaughter several millions of Americans in order to fight their battles?

Mr. FISH. I am sure the American people are prepared to take the position that no foreign power shall take over the political possession of Canada.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Whether it is Winston Churchill and his international-banker supporters?

Mr. FISH. I do not believe Canada will let those outsiders rule Canada.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Is it not true that undoubtedly Holland and France will be extremely glad to have us assume a protectorate over their islands, over Greenland in the case of Denmark? And does not the gentleman feel that they would be glad to negotiate to sell those countries?

Mr. FISH. I think we ought to protect the Dutch islands instead of letting the French and British occupy them. Furthermore, I think we ought to buy all the islands off our coast immediately or acquire them by peaceful means before other complications develop.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include a radio address which I made today.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM].

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I believe we should get back to the resolution to be considered and the rule making it in order.

This resolution is very simple. It states:

Resolved, etc., (1) That the United States would not recognize any transfer, and would not acquiesce in any attempt to transfer, any geographic region of the Western Hemisphere from one non-American power to another non-American power; and

(2) That if such transfer or attempt to transfer should appear likely, the United States shall, in addition to other measures, immediately consult with the other American republics to determine upon the steps which should be taken to safeguard their common interests.

Mr. Speaker, this is nothing new. It began, you might say, with the formation of our Government. George Washington referred to it many times. A resolution was approved by the Congress on January 15, 1811, and remember that was 12 years before the Monroe Doctrine was presented to the Congress in an address. The Monroe Doctrine occupied about one-half page of 13 pages sent to the Congress in 1823.

The resolution of 1811, referred to above reads as follows:

Taking into view the peculiar situation of Spain, and of her American provinces; and considering the influence which the destiny of the territory adjoining the southern border of the United States may have upon their security, tranquillity, and commerce: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the United States, under the peculiar circumstances of the existing crisis, cannot without serious inquietude see any part of said territory pass into the hands of any foreign power; and that a due regard to their own safety compels them to provide, under certain contingencies, for the temporary occupation of the said territory; they at the same time declare that the said territory shall, in their hands, remain subject to future negotiation.

That was on January 15, 1811.

Mr. Speaker, in order to acquaint the Members with all the facts, may I read quotations from what has been said with reference to the Monroe Doctrine dating from Washington to the present time. These show what the Monroe Doctrine really is. You all know that there is such a thing as the Monroe Doctrine, but many people are unfamiliar with it. They have gone to the library and asked for a copy of the Monroe Doctrine. They have telephoned me or they have written to me and stated that they wanted a copy of the Monroe Doctrine. You cannot secure it, unless you get the book of the messages and papers of the Presidents, and in there you will find the message of President Monroe, and in it here and there you will find the sections which constitute the Monroe Doctrine.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, the Monroe Doctrine was announced by President Monroe in his annual message, on December 2, 1823.

One of the prime points in the doctrine was:

The United States would consider any attempt on the part of the Allied Powers to extend their system to any part of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety.

This, in terms, covered the allied powers at this time, Austria, France, Russia, and Prussia; it covered the whole Western Hemisphere, those parts occupied by the Spanish colonies and other parts; it was aimed at the allied system.

Secretary Knox, speaking before the American Society for the Judicial Settlement of International Disputes on November 8, 1911, said:

The doctrine has been respected, and is now respected, and it will continue to be respected so long as we seem reasonably able to uphold it.

Mr. Elihu Root, speaking before the American Society of International Law on April 22, 1914, on the subject The Real Monroe Doctrine, said:

* * * It is a declaration of the United States that certain acts would be injurious to the peace and safety of the United States, and that the United States would regard them as unfriendly.

* * * The doctrine is not international law, but it rests upon the right of self-protection, and that right is recognized by international law.

* * * We frequently see statements that the doctrine has been changed or enlarged; that there is a new or different doctrine since Monroe's time. They are mistaken. There has been no change.

* * * A false conception of what the Monroe Doctrine is, of what it demands, and what it justifies, of its scope, and of its limits, has invaded the public press, and affected public opinion within the last few years.

Secretary Hughes, in an article printed in the American Journal of International Law, made these statements:

The Monroe Doctrine is not a policy of aggression: it is a policy of self-defense. * * * It still remains an assertion of the principle of national security. As such, it is obviously not exclusive. * * * The decision of the question as to what action the United States should take in any exigency arising in this hemisphere is not controlled by the content of the Monroe Doctrine, but may always be determined on grounds of international right and national security as freely as if the Monroe Doctrine did not exist. * * * The Monroe Doctrine rests "upon the right of every sovereign State to protect itself by preventing a condition of affairs in which it will be too late to protect itself."

It should be observed, however, that on April 4, 1864, the House passed without dissent a resolution which contemplated that—

The Congress of the United States are unwilling by silence to leave the nations of the world under the impression that they are indifferent spectators of the deplorable events now transpiring in the Republic of Mexico, and that they therefore think fit to declare that it does not accord with the policy of the United States to acknowledge any monarchical government erected on the ruins of any republican government in America under the auspices of any European power.

While this resolution does not in terms refer to the Monroe Doctrine, nevertheless, its provisions are such as to leave little doubt that the Monroe Doctrine was in the mind of the House when this resolution was passed.

Secretary Clay, in 1825, said:

For ourselves, we desire no change in the possession of Cuba, as has been heretofore stated. We cannot allow a transfer of the island to any European power.

Mr. Van Buren, then Secretary of State, on October 13, 1830, when instructing Mr. Van Ness, Minister to Spain, said:

They inform you that we are content that Cuba should remain as it now is, but could not consent to its transfer to any European power.

Secretary Fish, on July 14, 1870, speaking of the Monroe Doctrine, said:

It does not contemplate forcible intervention in any legitimate contest; but it protests against permitting such a contest to result in the increase of European power or influence; and it ever impels this Government, as in the late contest between the South American republics and Spain, to interpose its good offices to secure an honorable peace.

In his message of December 3, 1901, President Roosevelt declared:

This doctrine has nothing to do with the commercial relations of any American power, save that it in truth allows each of them to form such as it desires. * * * We do not guarantee any state against punishment if it misconducts itself, provided that punishment does not take the form of the acquisition of territory by any non-American power.

The quotations of Knox, Root, Hughes, Van Buren, Clay, Secretary Fish, and Theodore Roosevelt, give an interpretation and an understanding of the Monroe Doctrine in such a broad and comprehensive way that with such information before us at this time we have the best kind of evidence to guide the House so that this resolution should pass unanimously.

[Here the gavel fell.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SCRUGHAM asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

AMENDMENT TO SECTION 12 (B) OF THE SOIL CONSERVATION AND DOMESTIC ALLOTMENT ACT

Mr. KLEBERG filed a conference report and statement on the bill H. R. 9594, to amend section 12 (b) of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act, as amended, by authorizing the transfer of funds to cover advances for crop insurance.

MAINTENANCE OF MONROE DOCTRINE

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES].

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, every friend of liberty and of democracy is deeply moved by the tragic fate of France. While we are far removed from the scene of her bitter humiliation, we are deeply grieved that an old and valiant friend has been struck down. Today France lies prostrate, but tomorrow—and there always have been tomorrows and always will be—the genius of France will rise again. There is nothing we can do to avert her fate, but we can profit by her mistakes. We can profit from the lessons of disunity, the lessons of internal feuds and disputes. We can profit from the lesson taught us when Hitler, Stalin, and Mussolini flooded France with propaganda, when they built up organizations on French soil to create disunion and to divide the nation into hostile camps, when they flooded France with propaganda, "Peace at any price—there is no necessity to prepare." All the time, on French soil, when there was strife between capital and labor and an unwillingness to make concessions in the interest of national preservation, the German Reich was welding together its manpower and its national resources into a single, unprecedented striking force. The same Communist, Nazi, and Fascist organizations which existed in France and England for a decade and succeeded in undermining their national unity have been at work in this country during the same period on a larger and more active scale. We, too, have been inundated with the same foreign propaganda which disunited France and England. Only recently the C. I. O. announced the conditions and terms under which it was willing to cooperate in the national-defense program. A few days ago we read in the newspapers that certain industries engaged in assisting us to prepare have been charged by the Department of Justice with collusion for the purpose of making unreasonable profits. It seems to me that the administration and the Congress should make it clear that America expects everyone to do his duty. We will not permit anyone to sabotage our national-defense program by selfishness, disloyalty, or political expediency.

I heard the gentleman's speech with reference to this resolution. Let me say to the gentleman and to the Members of this Congress that, while we may adopt resolutions and it might be wise to do so, the dictators of Europe will not heed resolutions. There is only one language that any dictator, from the days of Caesar on down through the decades, has ever understood, and that is the language of a nation united, prepared, and determined to defend its liberty and its independence. Our hands are full with the task of preserving our own democracy, but there is much that we can do for the cause of freedom in this hour of darkness. We can make sure that on American shores the torch of liberty will be held aloft to encourage the despairing people in Europe. We can make sure that we will not repeat the folly that has produced the downfall of the French Republic and brought England to the verge of destruction.

Who is there in this country, employed or unemployed, rich or poor, who has not a vital stake in the preservation of democratic processes and machinery, without which there can be no progress or improvement? What man is there, ever so poor he may be, who has any hope of bettering his conditions if slavery is substituted for democratic government, and freedom is crushed beneath the iron heel of ruthless despotism?

So I say to the ladies and gentlemen of this Congress that we need firm, vigorous, and united action. We must first of all deal with the "fifth column" in this country, which operates through the same organizations which thrived on English soil and on French soil for 10 years; organizations linked to foreign powers such as we have in the United States today that are distributing thousands of pamphlets opposed to national defense, and are seeking to lull the people into a false sense of security; organizations that weakened the moral fiber of France and created hostile camps which destroyed all hope of unity. I hope the administration will adopt adequate measures and take vigorous steps. In my judgment the time has come when organizations that are linked to foreign governments and are the representatives of foreign dictators, serving the interests and carrying out the program of those dictators on American soil, should be declared illegal.

Transfer of sovereignty? Why, already we have a transfer of propaganda and foreign ideologies and activities from Europe to the Americas. This is the kind of invasion that is not contemplated by the Monroe Doctrine. It is the invasion that has occurred for the past 10 years by immigration and importation of foreign agents and organizations, so that when the opportune moment comes the enemies within can cooperate with invading troops. This is the kind of invasion that we must fear; and, more than that, we must fear disunity. We must fear the eternal squabbles and quarrels encouraged by selfish politicians, and at the same time welcome and safeguard honest differences of opinion and constructive criticism. Now is no time to mince words.

I do not mean to say that we are now in danger of any invasion of foreign armies. However, I cannot accept the assurance of Mr. Hitler, "Europe for Europeans" and "America for Americans," because I know that Mr. Hitler and Mr. Stalin and Mr. Mussolini have already invaded the Western Hemisphere with their agents and their propa-gandists. I know they have already violated the promise "Europe for Europeans and America for Americans" by their action in sending their agents to the Americas. I hope, Mr. Speaker—and I address my remarks to the administration and to this Congress—that before adjournment we can deal firmly and vigorously with those traitorous organizations in our midst that are seeking to do in this country exactly what they were able to do in France and in all other countries overrun by the dictators.

Furthermore, I hope we can come to understand that preparedness does not wholly consist of building navies and armies. You can appropriate money and write laws and pass resolutions and talk until the cows come home, but you can never prepare a country until it is welded together by patriotism, until there is unity, cohesion, and harmony among people of all classes, all races, and all creeds; until labor and capital, until business and government, until all of us alike can understand that today, as ever, democracy is the most difficult of all forms of government to retain. Its preservation requires courage, self-restraint, intelligence, and patriotism.

Liberty is a priceless possession, something that many have ceased to appreciate and properly value. For years you and I have heard people talk about the rights of citizens, the economic rights of citizens—rights, rights, and while we were talking about rights, Hitler and Mussolini were talking about the duties and responsibilities of citizenship, while their sole emphasis upon duty has produced a nation of slaves to the state—nevertheless we were wrong in always talking about rights without at the same time stressing duty and responsibility. For every right there must be a corresponding duty, and the people must be told that their liberty and independence cannot be preserved if they are unworthy of it, and if they lack an appreciation of it. If anyone thinks we can preserve liberty under regimented economies and dictatorial governments he is in great error.

So, Mr. Speaker, if our committee can secure full-hearted cooperation, we are in a position to give to the administration concrete proposals under which we can break up the "fifth column" in the United States without violating the Bill of Rights, or resorting to any repressive or undemocratic methods. If it is right to say to Mr. Hitler and Mr. Stalin and Mr. Mussolini, "You shall stay in Europe; you cannot come to the Western Hemisphere," we have the equal right to say to them, "You cannot establish political organizations on our shores for the purpose of dividing our people and destroying our liberty"; and if we can secure that cooperation, without which it is difficult for any committee or for any Member of Congress to secure the passage of necessary legislation—if we can secure it, I think we can promise this House that before adjournment we can give it a program of legislation. We can tighten and strengthen existing immigration laws, which will prevent the entrance of Nazi, Fascist, or Communist agents, and compel the deportation of aliens in this class; we can stop the misuse of the temporary visas under which thousands of aliens have been admitted to the United States who, when their terms expired, could not be deported because we were told it was impossible to deport them since the country from which they came would not accept them.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. No; I want to get these thoughts recorded. We will give you a program of laws that will make it mandatory to deal with aliens in our midst who are disloyal to the United States without in any respect harming the loyal and patriotic ones, laws that will enable us to outlaw by act of Congress organizations that are agents of foreign governments, laws that will deal effectually, promptly, and firmly with the "fifth column" in the United States. When we shall have done that, then we can prepare this country. We must put our own house in order. We must demand that the American Nation be placed in a state of defense—not that we anticipate invasion, but the safest way of discouraging it is for the American Nation to show the totalitarian governments that America, unlike France and England, stands united.

That is what our people want us to do. Our people, as never before, are clamoring for unity, the unity that will enable us to prepare this country adequately for any emergency that may arise. Our task is plain. As the democracies fall one by one, we must strengthen our resolution and ability to preserve freedom and liberty on our shores. We must make certain that every precaution is taken in order to vouchsafe the preservation of our free institutions, and in doing so we will have performed a great service not only for our own people but for mankind everywhere.

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. Yes.

Mr. SHANLEY. Under the Panamanian solidarity, with the rest of the South American republics, we have a duty to meet with the foreign ministers of those countries whenever we think foreign ideologists are invading our country, and we want to implement ourselves with this resolution today. But it is necessary that we decide and know what these foreign ideologies are.

Mr. DIES. I will give the gentleman a few facts. Mexico, by act of Congress, admitted 172,000 people from loyalist Spain. Ten thousand of them served in the Army of the loyalist government in Spain, and in South America it is estimated that there are approximately 600,000 Germans, and thousands of Italians.

Mr. SHANLEY. I am interested in the domestic situation. Will the gentleman's committee be able to give us the definition of subversive practices, so that by language we will be able to put on the statute books what subversive practices are, and to wipe them out?

Mr. DIES. With the help of this administration we will bring you in a bill, first, that will outlaw the German-American Bund, the Communist Party, and other organizations which the committee has found to be agents of foreign governments. [Applause.] That is the first thing we can do. [Applause.] The next thing we can do is to prevent the admission of foreign agents under the guise of refugees. We have information of foreign agents operating in the United States who came in under the guise of refugees. We can put a stop to the laxity that has characterized our enforcement of existing immigration and deportation laws. We can do this with no hardship to those who are loyal and deserving, but certainly it is a disgraceful spectacle that here is an organization such as the German-American Bund with 90 percent of its members naturalized since the World War, many of whom are veterans of the German Army.

Yet they come to the United States and receive their naturalization papers, and notwithstanding that fact, they salute the swastika and goose-step with all of the admiration for Hitler that they would have if they resided in Germany. I refer to organizations like the German-American Alliance, with 300,000 members, so they claim, and organizations like the Communist Party. According to the confidential reports of the Communist Party of California, more than half of the membership were born in a foreign country. When anyone comes to America and thereafter ceases to be loyal, or if he gives evidence of his disloyalty to this flag, or if he believes in a foreign dictator and in the kind of government that has been established in foreign lands more than he does in the Government of the United States, we can certainly accommodate him by putting him on a boat and sending him to the country of his affection. [Applause.]

I could outline to the gentleman a course of procedure that, under existing laws, would enable us to bring to the bar of justice men, for instance, like William Browder, who had on deposit $1,300,000 to his personal account, and who had never paid any income tax; organizations that take in millions of dollars every year in this country, which do not pay any corporation tax, and yet they use their proceeds and their funds to spread propaganda day in and day out, and seek to introduce the same destructive ideology that they succeeded in spreading in France, England, and other countries.

You who underestimate the power of propaganda fail to realize that propaganda has always been the strongest arm of despotism and of tyranny. When a country is subjected to it day in and day out, as the people were in France and England, it often produces the result of a weakened and disunited country. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend the remarks I made this afternoon by including therein a letter.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 556) approving nonrecognition of the transfer of any geographic region in the Western Hemisphere from one non-American power to another non-American power, and providing for consultation with other American republics in the event that such transfer should appear likely.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 556, with Mr. DUNCAN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the joint resolution was dispensed with.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, or if the majority leader will answer it might be preferable, is it the intention to proceed with a vote on this bill today, or just conclude general debate?

Mr. RAYBURN. We must finish this joint resolution today.

Mr. FISH. That will take about 3 hours.

Mr. RAYBURN. We have not had a night session for any business. We want to transact a great deal of business. All the appropriation bills must be passed before July 1. You know the condition that may be in the House next week.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman would not be satisfied to conclude general debate of 2 hours tonight and then vote on the joint resolution tomorrow?

Mr. RAYBURN. Well, that would mean probably 2 hours of debate under the 5-minute rule. If we get into an arrangement like that the first thing we would have to adjourn because there would be nobody here. I must insist on finishing the joint resolution tonight.

Mr. FISH. I agree with the gentleman. I just wanted to know.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, is it the intention of the gentleman to use all the time he has been allowed under the rule? If he will cut down his time I will cut mine down.

Mr. FISH. I have requests for 1 hour.

Mr. BLOOM. If you are going to use all of your time, I will have to use all of mine, but if you will cut it down to 5 or 10 minutes I will cut mine down.

Mr. FISH. I am sorry I cannot do that. I have made definite promises to Members.

Mr. BLOOM. They can be heard just the same under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. FISH. I will try to cut them down, but I will not make any promises.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON].

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not exaggerate when I say that at this particular time we are confronted by one of the gravest conditions that has existed throughout the world for a century. Our own country is deeply concerned and should be concerned with the preservation of our Republic.

This resolution is designed for the sole purpose of preserving our own national defense and of keeping the war from our hemisphere. I agree with what my colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES], has just said when he emphasized that one of the essentials in preserving peace and in preserving our country is unity. I think it is of vital importance that we should preserve in our own country and should give notice to the world that the United States is united on some things.

I think this resolution proclaims one traditional policy upon which we have never been divided. For 150 years our country, regardless of who was in the White House, regardless of which of the major parties controlled, has always proclaimed that the Monroe Doctrine and its essence was essential for the preservation of our rights and our safety. As was so well said by the chairman of our committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM] when he read the definition of the Monroe Doctrine, it was founded and enunciated for our own defense. If it was important in 1823 when President Monroe defined the Monroe Doctrine, if it was necessary for the preservation of our country then that no non-American power should acquire control of any region upon this hemisphere, how vastly more important is it now?

Airplanes and other inventions have reduced proportionately the size of the world and our peace is now jeopardized by incidents that occur much farther from the United States than when Monroe declared his great doctrine 117 years ago.

The Monroe Doctrine existed not only from the time of its enunciation by President Monroe in 1823, but it has been the doctrine of our country since its foundation, as enunciated by George Washington, the first President of our country; it is founded upon the law of nations; it is founded upon the law of defense; it is founded upon our rights and the preservation of our own country.

Someone has asked, if that doctrine is known, why do we now pass a resolution in declaration of it. We do so for the simple and only reason of giving notice to the world that the United States of America is united in its firm belief in that traditional policy, that we are united, and that not only the President is for it but that he and the Congress of the United States are united on this policy and intend to see that it is enforced. I was glad that on yesterday the Senate by a unanimous vote—76 ayes and no noes—gave notice to the world that we would stand upon this doctrine and that we would insist upon it.

This resolution declares that the United States would not recognize any transfer, and would not acquiesce in any attempt to transfer any geographic region of this hemisphere from one non-American power to another non-American power.

It is important that this resolution be passed now because conditions in Europe with the warfare there are coming to what seems to be a crisis. We know not what day there may be treaties, truces, or an armistice signed in which some of the belligerents having possessions in this country might be called upon to transfer some of their territory in this country to another non-American power.

We want to give notice now before any overt act is committed that America believes in and the United States will stand for the preservation of that doctrine which says that our safety is endangered if there is any transfer of possessions in this hemisphere to any non-American country, just as we have for 150 years.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Briefly.

Mr. CELLER. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that there is ample precedent, because in 1912 a resolution was adopted whereby we refused to permit the transfer of an island in Magdalena Bay from Mexico to Japan.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I am familiar with the incident to which the gentleman refers. I can give the gentleman a precedent 100 years older than that. In 1811, when James Madison was President of the United States, 11 years before Monroe was President, there was a threat upon the part of a European power to acquire possession of Florida and some other countries not then a part of the United States. President Madison sent a secret message to the Congress warning of the danger. What did Congress do? They passed a resolution similar to this giving notice that the United States would not recognize the transfer of any title to or of any interest in any country; and nothing was done because they had notice of it, and knew that America would not tolerate any transfer. That is simply what we are trying to do now, to follow that precedent and the precedent to which the gentleman has referred.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. POAGE. Might it not be wise not only to follow the precedent, but to go still further and acquire these islands, as we later acquired Florida, for a proper consideration, of course? Might it not be well now, regardless of the outcome of the European war, to begin negotiations to acquire them as American territory?

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's suggestion. I do not know what the outcome in Europe may be, but it may hasten and accelerate the acquisition of islands in this country. For our defense we need islands now that we never needed before.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Briefly.

Mr. CELLER. I would like to have the gentleman's views upon this proposition. Iceland, for example, has been transferred from Denmark to Great Britain. France may soon be prostrate and powerless. Suppose Great Britain, a country friendly to us, should undertake to acquire or protect some of the French possessions in this hemisphere. What would be the situation then? I am curious to know what the gentleman's view is.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. The interpretation of those events will take place as they happen. This resolution is leveled not at one set of belligerents but at all belligerents whether they are friendly to us or not. We propose to treat all alike so that there shall be no transfer of sovereignty in this hemisphere by any non-American power.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman, I recognize, can quote precedents, but precedents are not always surrounded by the same conditions, as hinted by the last speaker. Vastly different is the determination now under these momentous conditions from the time those precedents were created.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I agree that conditions are momentous, and for that reason it is all the more imperative, in my opinion, that we take a firm step now. If we cannot stand upon the traditional policy which we have built and which is recognized as one of the means of safety of this country, then I think we are sliding backward.

Mr. EATON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. EATON. The gentleman, of course, will lay hold of the fact that when these precedents were established this was a small, weak nation?

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. True.

Mr. EATON. We were speaking at that time to great, powerful nations, while now we are supposed to be at least of considerable size and ability to take care of ourselves.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I thank the gentleman. We were not afraid when small to assert our rights, and we certainly should not be afraid now to do so when we are strong to assert our rights. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS].

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, this is a historic occasion. It is 129 years since the Congress took comparable action. This is the first time in history that the Monroe Doctrine has ever been enacted into a legislative resolution. The policy we are here reaffirming antedates the Monroe Doctrine but it forms part of it. This policy is more fundamental than a statute, a treaty, or any principle of international law. In the words of Elihu Root it rests "upon the right of self-protection and that right is recognized by international law." We are reaffirming it in a time of threatened changed conditions. This is exactly the time when such a policy is most needed. It was born out of such a time and has been restated and reenforced in such times, because, as Charles Evans Hughes said, "Despite changes in conditions it still remains, to be applied if necessary, as a principle of national security."

It is simply untrue to say that this is historically a British policy, set up in reliance upon the British Fleet. It was invoked against the British in 1803 and 1811. The British disapproved of two of the fundamental pronouncements by President Monroe in 1823. It was invoked against Britain by Cleveland in 1897 and against the British as well as Germany and Italy in the Venezuelan dispute in 1902.

This resolution has two parts because the modern Monroe Doctrine has two parts.

First, there is a unilateral statement as to what we will do alone. We will not recognize nor acquiesce in transfers within this hemisphere by non-American powers.

Second, there is a multilateral statement as to what we will do with others. We will consult with our neighboring republics to determine upon common action to safeguard our common interests.

Some will object to the first and some to the second provision. Aside from all theoretical and academic questions of logic and consistency, both are needed to state our policy realistically and practically. We have not a Yankee-controlled empire in this hemisphere. We have not a hemisphere league of nations. We are evolving toward a pan-American ideal, a practical working union of neighboring States. We will do certain things, alone and without collaboration, to protect our national security. We are willing to do certain other things in concert with our neighbors to protect our common security. There are two phases of our policy and neither can be ignored.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GIFFORD. The whereases recited in this resolution say that we will consult over the matter, then we declare our policy before we consult. Does the gentleman anticipate perfect agreement with all the other consultants?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. As I just explained, we do two things in this resolution, which merely restates the modern Monroe Doctrine. First, as to matters that concern us alone, we reserve our right of action; second as to matters of common interest, and I quote the resolution, "We agree to consult to determine upon a course."

There are two phases to our policy and we cannot realistically ignore either of them.

This is no time for us to attempt precise limitations and descriptions of our interest in this hemisphere. We are not as immediately interested in some portions of the hemisphere as in others, but our southern neighbors, if they are to work with us, are interested in their southern neighbors, and their neighbors in their southern neighbors, and so on until this area of required united action covers two continents from pole to pole and ocean to ocean and then out into each ocean.

We will not define at this time the precise boundaries of our sphere of interest and we are not stating in advance exactly what we will do. We do not agree in advance to go to war or not to go to war. We are simply repainting our "no trespassing" sign so that would-be trespassers will be sure to see it.

Why is congressional action needed at this time? Why not merely let the President resay it?

There are two reasons:

First. We must show the world that we are united on this line of defense and show it solemnly, formally, and forcefully.

Second. Our President has made so many inconsistent, extravagant, and unreliable statements, openly and secretly, as to our present and future foreign policy that his words have lost their force abroad.

Mr. BENDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BENDER. I recall the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] made the statement that we serve notice on Stalin, Hitler, and Mussolini that they keep out of America. Does not the gentleman feel at the same time we ought to serve notice on Roosevelt to keep out of Europe?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I think that is a good idea.

Whatever the reasons may be which prompted the administration to seek approval from the Congress for statements of our foreign policy, I rejoice that in this time of crisis and confusion we are establishing a precedent of united action by the Executive and the Congress in discharging our joint responsibility under our Constitution in formulating and stating our foreign policy.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Going directly to the unilateral portion of this resolution, the United States having adopted the resolution, and thus having stated our position, what, in the opinion of the committee, would create a set of conditions that would appear likely to call into operation part 2 of the bill? In other words, will the gentleman tell us whether or not, in the opinion of the committee, this resolution having been adopted, current conditions would appear likely to such an extent that we would probably immediately consult the other 21 or 22 nations of the Western Hemisphere?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I think conditions are likely to obtain in the next few days which would require such consultation, and we have a resolution to that effect before our committee. Let me, in answering the gentleman's question, refer to a question which was raised as to what we would do in case the non-American motherland owning some of these American territories having changed hands through conquest.

We have first a precedent in the 1811 action when Florida having changed hands, in that Napoleon put in a new king in Spain, and we simply took over Florida for the duration. I would suggest, however, that what we should do is to offer to buy, let us say, Curaçao from the Dutch, and if the Dutch say, "Our country is now occupied by Germany," we should turn to Hitler and say, "Well, you have no objection, have you, to the Dutch selling us Curaçao?" If he says "Yes," then we proceed to buy Curaçao. If Hitler would say "No," then we will find out where he stands and he will have to go back on the statements he has made in the past few days—that he has no intention of interfering in this hemisphere. I think we should smoke out those powers as to exactly where they stand on our peaceful purchase of some of these islands. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAWFORD. May I ask the gentleman one other question?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If the United States, following up this resolution and having in mind the conferences of 1936, 1938, and 1939, and then the other countries under part 2 refuse to go along, are we in any way obligated to lay down or can we proceed?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. We have preserved our freedom of action under No. 1, and in No. 2 we say that we will consult "in addition to other measures."

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute to answer a question.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Of course, this resolution would be meaningless if we did not have a national defense to back it up. It is vital that we have an adequate national defense to back up this resolution, because it would be a mere scrap of paper without it.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I think that we have a national defense to back this up, and I remind my colleague that we first announced the principles of the Monroe Doctrine when we were a weak nation and we were announcing that doctrine against the strongest nations of Europe. We have always had the strength and the moral force to back up the Monroe Doctrine including this doctrine of nonrecognition of such transfers.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Today we need an increased national defense also. I have always advocated complete national defense. The United States is a great Nation, and we must maintain its greatness.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman another one-half minute.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I would like the gentleman's opinion upon whether or not the pending resolution is an enlargement of the Monroe Doctrine?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. It is not an enlargement of the Monroe Doctrine, it is a reaffirmation of existing policies and the committee, by the committee amendment, has changed the preamble, as you will notice, to show that this is merely a restatement and affirmation of our traditional policy, and if you will read the report you will see that both sections 1 and 2 are merely reaffirmation of the existing policy.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Is it not true also that this is a very friendly gesture to the countries in the Western Hemisphere? We have always been the best of friends and we want to continue that friendship and I am sure that they will be just as glad of this resolution as we are ourselves.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I think this is not only a friendly but an encouraging gesture to our neighbors to the south, to let them know that we are affirming the position that we have worked out with them in recent years by conferences and are not backing down one bit on it.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. We have a mutual respect, in other words and show it by passing this resolution.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. A mutual respect and agreement to work together in our common interest.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTON].

Mr. BARTON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I will promise the Committee not to use 10 minutes, but only a fraction of that time. I think we ought to have clearly in mind that we are taking this action at a time when conditions are different than they have ever been at any period of our history. Always more or less implicit in the Monroe Doctrine has been the existence and the friendly cooperation of the British fleet. To be sure we have once or twice been compelled to apply the doctrine to Great Britain, but, generally speaking, through the years of our national existence Great Britain, not because of any love of us, but because she was interested in maintaining the balance of power in Europe and not having a European rival extending its territory or its jurisdiction in this hemisphere, Great Britain has generally been on the side of the Monroe Doctrine and we could count on the help of her fleet in upholding it.

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTON of New York. I yield.

Mr. SHANLEY. And that was endorsed by both Madison and Jefferson.

Mr. BARTON of New York. Endorsed by Madison and Jefferson explicitly.

Now, we might as well be frank and recognize that we are facing the possibility that both the French Fleet and the English Fleet may not be on our side, may possibly not be in existence, may even be in the hands of unfriendly powers. So when we stand up here and wave our arms and say that we are going to protect the whole Western Hemisphere we want to realize that we are by law biting off something bigger than the country has ever bitten off before.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Nations may have changed, but principles do not change, do they?

Mr. BARTON of New York. That is true; and one of the principles is that Mickey Rooney should not fight Joe Louis.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Does not the gentleman think that the Monroe Doctrine was essential for our safety when the world was large and when conditions were not like they are now with reference to airplanes, and that it is more essential now, when we have to take territory further away to protect us? Does the gentleman not think there is a greater reason for the Monroe Doctrine now than when it was enunciated?

Mr. BARTON of New York. I think there is as great or a greater reason, but the point I make to this committee is this: Nobody has any doubt that it is a menace to our safety to have anything happen to the territory between us and the Panama Canal, or perhaps 1,500 miles below the Panama Canal, but in the resolution before us we are embracing territory to the very end of South America, the Argentine, 6,500 miles from our own country. We could easily conceive a situation where our fleet might be spread out occupying and protecting bits of islands and bits of country all over the Atlantic and the Pacific. This is the very big affirmation that we are making; this is what the resolution involves.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Does not the gentleman think that reaffirming the Monroe Doctrine is what we should do rather than make it more specific, such as the words "not acquiesce"? I am thinking about this: What if France should cede or transfer one of her islands in the Caribbean to Germany?

Mr. BARTON of New York. My feeling is, first, that I think it is a mistake to bring this up at all. We have had the Monroe Doctrine in force for 117 years. If there is one element of our foreign policy that is consistent and effective and understood in every chancelery in Europe and in the Orient, it is the Monroe Doctrine; and now, at this particular time, after 117 years, we suddenly feel that we have to enact it into law.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTON of New York. Yes.

Mr. BENDER. When gentlemen on the other side discuss the reaffirmation of the Monroe Doctrine, they reaffirm only a part of it, because this is also a part:

> In the wars of European powers, in matters relating to themselves, we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do.

That also is a part of the Monroe Doctrine.

Mr. BARTON of New York. Perhaps if the gentleman will offer that as an amendment the chairman of the committee will accept it.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTON of New York. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. I am sure that the gentleman, like most of us, is in accord with the principles of the Monroe Doctrine, but it might be well to know, for the purposes of history, of the many cases where the Monroe Doctrine has been violated. For instance, Britain was a frequent infringer of the doctrine. She took possession of the Falkland Islands, and we made no protest. Also, in 1842, Britain blockaded Nicaragua, and a few years later blockaded Buenos Aires, and there was no protest from the United States. We were too weak to do so. In 1851 Britain seized Salvador's port, and similarly the ports of Chile were bombarded by warships of Spain some years later, but we were a weak Nation then, too weak to protest. Now the situation is different, and we are strong enough to protest, and we should protest every inch of the way. And I am sure this resolution would be in furtherance of the idea of the Monroe Doctrine. I am sure the gentleman from New York will not want to vote against the bill.

Mr. BARTON of New York. Oh, I want to make it clear that I am going to support the resolution.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTON of New York. Yes.

Mr. BLOOM. I believe the gentleman said that everyone knows what the Monroe Doctrine is. Would the gentleman kindly explain what he knows the Monroe Doctrine is?

Mr. BARTON of New York. If I know?

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman kindly explain what the doctrine is?

Mr. BARTON of New York. Oh, the gentleman explained it and read many authorities, and I think the committee fully understood.

Mr. BLOOM. And that is what the Monroe Doctrine is?

Mr. BARTON of New York. Yes.

Mr. BLOOM. That is all that this resolution provides.

Mr. BARTON of New York. May I make the following point, if the gentleman will allow me to conclude what I have to say—I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM]—I do not object particularly to having this resolution enacted. The argument in the committee was that it would not do any harm and it might do some good. That was the principal argument that was advanced for it. But I think that from this time forward in this House we ought to recognize that passing resolutions and making speeches and using words is the most dangerous thing that can be done at a time like this. [Applause.]

I remember the night when word came over the radio that Chamberlain had said that England and France would come to the aid of Poland. I got down the atlas, and when I looked at Poland I discovered there was no possible way that England and France could come to the defense of Poland. That remark was leading Poland to depend on something and to risk her national life on something that could not possibly be backed up. From that point on I began to wonder whether the Allies were as smart as we were thinking they were going to be, and how they were going to come out in this war.

I remember in the debate on the embargo, which I think is going to have some very humorous passages when we read it in a few years, we were assured that if we would lift the embargo, if we would just change one of our laws, we would stop Hitler. How ridiculous all that sounds in the light of what has happened since. When the Polish Army could not stop him, when the British Navy could not stop him, when Belgium and Norway and France could not stop him, we have this fatuous idea in America that if we will just utter some words or pass a resolution that we can do something.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTON of New York. I yield.

Mr. BLOOM. The lifting of the embargo was merely a domestic law. There was nothing in the Neutrality Act at that time about Europe. They were making a law to keep this country out of war. We were making a law so that none of our ships would be sunk. There was not one ship scratched during the whole time.

Mr. BARTON of New York. The gentleman will certainly not deny that we were assured and reassured that if we lifted the embargo we would stop Hitler and there would be no European war?

Mr. BLOOM. Not from this side of the House.

Mr. BARTON of New York. Oh, yes. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] 5 minutes.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, in connection with what the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTON] just said with respect to the purposes of the repeal of the Neutrality Act and what it has and has not accomplished, I would like to refresh our memories by calling attention to a sentence from the President's speech at the opening of the special session of the Congress:

> The objective of restricting American ships from entering such zones may be obtained by prohibiting such entry by the Congress, or the result can be substantially achieved by Executive proclamation that all such voyages are solely at the risk of American owners themselves.

I bring that to your attention because I think we are overlooking the fact that the amending of the Neutrality Act was not necessary to keep American ships out of the war zone. As the President said, the result could have been achieved by an Executive proclamation.

Nor was it necessary to amend the Neutrality Act to keep Americans off of belligerent ships. The President said as to that objective:

> The second objective is to prevent American citizens from traveling on belligerent vessels, and this can also be accomplished by legislation through a continuance in force of existing law.

Hence we merely reaffirmed in that portion of the present Neutrality Act what was already on the statute books.

Also, in refreshing our memories on some of the circumstances attendant upon action of this character, I want to call attention to the fact that the Monroe Doctrine itself was promulgated in the face of a crisis in Europe. The enunciation of the Monroe Doctrine was made at a time when Europe was under the influence of the so-called Holy Alliance, and the then President acted in the face of a threatening situation. That is about what we are doing now. Somehow human nature acts that way.

James Madison, writing to Monroe at the time, said:

> There ought not be any backwardness about this—

That is, about making the proclamation—

> but we should keep in view, of course, the spirit and forms of the Constitution in every step taken in the road to war, which must be the last step if those short of war should be without avail.

It is interesting to note incidentally that the phrase "steps short of war" was used by Madison in 1823. And he used it understandingly. War itself is the last step. It is axiomatic that we cannot continue to take steps short of war without walking in that direction. Then there is that model statement of foreign policy which Thomas Jefferson made in his letter to Monroe after Monroe had sent to him the preliminary draft of his message. Made today by some people it might be regarded as treasonable or pro-Nazi, or something like that, but Jefferson made it long before Nazis were known. Since Jefferson made it when Monroe was about to propose his doctrine, it should be in order to recall it when we are about to reaffirm the doctrine.

Jefferson wrote:

> Our first and fundamental maxim should be never to entangle ouselves in the broils of Europe; our second, never to suffer Europe to intermeddle with cis-Atlantic affairs.

Thus, Jefferson, commenting upon the preliminary draft of what has come to be known as the Monroe Doctrine, placed first the maxim of not entangling ourselves in the broils of Europe; and, second, not permitting Europe to intermeddle here.

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. SHANLEY. Is that the letter of October 24, 1823?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. SHANLEY. In the last paragraph of that letter he also said:

> Great Britain is the nation which can do us the most harm of anyone or all on earth, and with her on our side we need not fear the whole world. With her, then, we should most sedulously cherish a cordial friendship; and nothing would tend more to knit our affections than to be fighting once more, side by side, in the same cause.

I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTON] referred to this fact, too, that under the protecting aegis of Great Britain we were able to maintain the Monroe Doctrine.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I am glad the gentleman quoted that portion of Jefferson's letter. I think Jefferson was right on that point also, but to get Jefferson's full position we should also quote the concluding sentence that immediately follows the quotation the gentleman gave. In the concluding sentence Jefferson said:

> Not that I would purchase even her amity at the price of taking part in her wars.

Jefferson believed, and I believe, that the decision as to when America goes to war should be made in Washington and not in any other capital whatsoever. That is the basis of our sovereignty. It is the essence of our independence. The decision should be made on the basis of our primary interests, not on the basis of policies, intrigues, or stakes in which we have no share. The decision should be made by us when we are ready; certainly we lose our independence if we condemn our people blindly to pay for the blunders, the indecisions, the lack of preparedness, or the ambitions of any other nation. That would be conscription without representation. And that is what I think Jefferson had in mind in the sentence I have read.

Mr. SHANLEY. That is all right. That is the sentence that followed the part I quoted. The point is that he knew at that particular time that we could fight for that doctrine under the mantle of England's protection. That was the basis of the Monroe Doctrine.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The gentleman is correct in pointing out that in the development of the doctrine we took that protection, and, by implication that if that protection is weakened we must seek ways to strengthen or replace it. There is practically no difference of opinion on that point.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield one additional minute to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I merely wish in conclusion to say that I see no particular objection, now that it has come before us, in adopting the resolution. It is our policy and has been, and certainly there can be no harm in a reaffirmation of what the Monroe Doctrine is, in again saying that it is a fundamental American policy. The value will depend upon the wisdom shown in its application. It should be noted that the resolution itself is not discriminatory, that it applies equally to the transfer of sovereignty between non-American powers, whether they happen to be belligerents with whom we sympathize or not. It applies equally to all. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOLLES].

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Chairman, for the 117 years of the existence of the Monroe Doctrine no legislation of the character produced here has ever been devised or presented to the Congress for adoption. In fact, the Monroe Doctrine has been accepted as something like the Declaration of Independence and Washington's Farewell Address.

This is a measure to legislate on the Monroe Doctrine.

It is not necessary nor will any attempt to interpret its meaning add one jot or tittle to its weight.

It has been said that the Monroe Doctrine has no binding authority: First, because it has not been admitted into the code of international law, and, second, because it has never been adopted or declared by Congress. In reply it may be said that the principle of self-defense, the preservation of the peace and safety of the Nation, is recognized as an elementary part of international law. The doctrine did not require congressional action to control the conduct of the Executive any more than the policy announced in Washington's address of noninterference in European affairs. It stands today as a cardinal policy of our Government. In the prophetic language of Mr. Jefferson, "it sets our compass and points the course which we are to steer through the ocean of time opening on us." We may well close its consideration with the words of Daniel Webster in the United States Senate:

I look on the message of December 1823 as forming a bright page in our history. I will neither help to erase it or tear it out; nor shall it be by any act of mine blurred or blotted.

To pass an act interpreting the Monroe Doctrine would be as absurd as legislating the Declaration of Independence or the Farewell Address into public law. There are things that are law in and of themselves. The Monroe Doctrine is one of the most outstanding examples. It is as much a part of America as America is of itself.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLLES. I yield.

Mr. CELLER. It may be interesting for the sake of the RECORD to recall that a resolution was adopted by the Senate in 1912 which embodied the Monroe Doctrine with reference to Mexico and Japan, a resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Lodge. It was adopted by the Senate by a huge vote. The occasion for it was the attempt by a private company on behalf of a foreign country to get a foothold in Magdalena Bay in Mexico.

Mr. BOLLES. But it did not attempt to interpret the Monroe Doctrine.

Mr. CELLER. I will read it to the gentleman if he wishes.

Mr. BOLLES. I have not time.

Mr. CELLER. The principle of the Monroe Doctrine was embodied in a resolution adopted by the Senate.

Mr. BOLLES. There have been several occasions, I may say to my distinguished friend who is a member of the Judiciary Committee, when we have adopted resolutions concerning an incident in which the Monroe Doctrine figured.

Mr. TIBBOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLLES. I yield.

Mr. TIBBOTT. That particular event had to do with the transfer of Mexican territory to Japan and was not the transfer of territory from one non-American country to another. It is not, therefore, a precedent.

Mr. BOLLES. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, the Monroe Doctrine was never a statutory law. By the very nature of the doctrine itself it could not become a matter of direct congressional action. There are three state papers in the history of our country devoid of the character of public law, either national or international. Yet each has exercised the most potent influence on the conduct of many other nations of the earth. These three are the Declaration of Independence, Washington's Farewell Address, and finally the Monroe Doctrine. Each has an intimate relation to each other and has successfully been the outgrowth the one of the other.

The Monroe Doctrine was not conceived in any humanitarian interest; it had no sentimental kindness about it. Boiled down into its last analysis, it was a measure for the protection of the United States. It was a "no trespass" sign to all the nations of the world. It had a tremendous influence upon the destiny of many nations. Upon the rock of the Monroe Doctrine the Holy Alliance was shipwrecked. It made it possible for the Spanish colonies in Central and South America to keep their independence from Spain. It made it possible for Portuguese Brazil to erect itself into an American empire and afterward into a republic. It carried out the principles in the Farewell Address of George Washington, that—

Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation, hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns.

And again it emphasized in that address—

We may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon to be scrupulously respected, when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard giving us provocation.

We were determined from the beginning to keep the Western Hemisphere free from new colonization or conquests. When the Spanish colonies in South and Central America revolted, we quickly acknowledged their independence. Immediately there was a convulsion in the Holy Alliance which had been effected by the Emperors of Russia and Austria and the King of Prussia in 1815, and for a time included France and England. That alliance was hostile to the rights of the people and the freedom of nations, and reiterated the principle of divine right and the power of princes as the first and most important element. It was against press freedom as the most dangerous enemy to absolutism. The fundamentals of the American Constitution were anathema to the alliance.

The Monroe Doctrine was not a sudden declaration for a specific purpose. It came from the very peculiar position the Western Hemisphere occupied in the march of submerged millions toward the light of a better and brighter day. And it also came as a clarion call of the United States to its own people in its own defense. It was a notice hung on the walls of ancient grasping nations that America was going to look to and after all America—her blood child.

The principle or policy of the Monroe Doctrine declares affirmatively—and this should be of interest to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, for he asked the gentleman from New York what the Monroe Doctrine was.

The principle or policy of the Monroe Doctrine declares affirmatively:

First. That no European power, or combination of powers, can intervene in the affairs of this hemisphere for the purpose, or with the effect, of forcibly changing the form of government of the nations, or controlling the free will of their people.

Second. That no such power or powers can permanently acquire or hold any new territory or dominion on this hemisphere.

Third. That the colonies or territories now held by them cannot be enlarged by encroachment on neighboring territory, nor be transferred to any other European power, and while the United States does not propose to interfere with existing colonies, "it looks hopefully to the time when * * * America shall be wholly American."

Fourth. That any interoceanic canal across the isthmus of Central America must be free from the control of European powers.

While each of the foregoing declarations has been officially recognized as a proper application of the Monroe Doctrine, says Foster in his history of American diplomacy, the Government of the United States reserves to decide, as each case arises, the time and manner of its interposition and the extent and character of the same, whether moral or material, or both.

In his message of May 28, 1870, relating to San Domingo, Grant stated:

The doctrine promulgated by President Monroe has been adhered to by all political parties and I now deem it proper to assert the equally important principle that hereafter no territory on this continent shall be regarded as subject to transfer to a European power.

This is the statement in the message of President Grant, and practically the resolution which we have before us today follows this, but as a matter of legislation.

The Monroe Doctrine, as negatively declared, may be stated as follows:

First. That the United States does not contemplate a permanent alliance with any other American power to enforce the doctrine, as it determines its action solely by its view of its own peace and safety; but it welcomes the concurrence and cooperation of the other in its enforcement, in the way that to the latter may seem best.

Second. That the United States does not insist upon the exclusive sway of republican government, but while favoring that system, it recognizes the right of the people of every country of this hemisphere to determine for themselves their form of government.

Third. That the United States does not contemplate a protectorate over any other American nation, seek to control the latter's conduct in relation to other nations, nor become responsible for its acts.

We have never gone to war over any violations of the Monroe Doctrine. It has been a great instrument of peace.

When President Monroe was contemplating the issuance in his message of this momentous statement hereafter to bear his name, he wrote to Jefferson about it. Monroe was troubled because he saw that England wanted to control South and Central America. On the other hand was the Holy Alliance, bent on restoring the revolted Spanish republics to Spain. We accepted neither horn of the dilemma.

Jefferson wrote to Monroe:

The question presented by the letters you have sent me is the most momentous which has ever been offered to my contemplation since that of independence. That made us a nation. This sets our compass and points the course which we are to steer through the ocean of time opening on us. And never could we embark on it under circumstances more auspicious. Our first and fundamental maxim should be never to entangle ourselves in the broils of Europe. Our second, never to suffer Europe to intermeddle with cis-Atlantic affairs. America, North and South, has a set of interests distinct from those of Europe, and peculiarly her own. She should, therefore, have a system of her own, separate and apart from that of Europe. While the last is laboring to become the domicile of despotism, our endeavor should surely be to make our hemisphere that of freedom.

So we got the Monroe Doctrine. We did not join in an alliance with England which Jefferson wanted. Adams reflected the action when he said:

It would be more candid as well as more dignified to avow our principles explicitly to Russia and France than to come in as a cockboat in the wake of a British man-of-war.

Russia and England wanted what is now our own Pacific coast. The Monroe Doctrine having disposed of England's claws, ended in Russia going back to Alaska and leaving the California coast to Mexico. This was the first definite result of the doctrine.

Now I am concerned here with congressional action in any form or in any circumstances with the doctrine and its application, rather than with the history of events.

We have passed some resolutions, taken some action in Congress on New World policies merely to add polemical judgment to an accomplished fact.

We said: "This is it. We have already said it; why worry over it?" In 1826 we said that we are free to declare our friendships toward the South American republics as "their," not our, "honor shall dictate."

Do not overlook the fact that in those days we were dealing with some of the worst dictators that ever rode a silver-mounted saddle. Rosas of Argentina, the Lopez family of Paraguay, who killed more people than all the gangsters in the United States since the New Deal made it possible, were riding high.

Now, remember that Great Britain was never so hotly friendly to the Monroe Doctrine when it stepped on British toes. There was no idea in the British mind of giving up anything it had in America. It took some time to show Britain that what she had was all she would get. It at one time wanted Cuba. So did France. We said "No" in diplomatic emphasis. That ended the episode.

The dizzy-powered Napoleon III, little in stature, smaller in brain, egotist and strutter, egged on by the British who wanted the Southern Confederacy to win the Civil War, sent his whiskered, dandified puppet, Maximilian, to take over Mexico. Later when we got around to the task, Sheridan, on the Rio Grande, without a shot, ended this interlude.

President Grover Cleveland is justly credited with the most convincing analysis of the doctrine in his message to Congress in 1895. Later this was followed by one of our great state papers by Secretary Olney on the question of the claims of Great Britain to territory at the mouth of the Orinoco in Venezuela. Of the Monroe Doctrine President Cleveland said:

It was intended to apply to every stage in our national life and cannot become obsolete while our Republic endures.

And again Mr. Cleveland said:

The Monroe Doctrine finds its recognition in those principles of international law which are based upon the theory that every nation will have its rights protected and its just claims enforced.

And his closing, which caused Great Britain to pause in her Venezuelan aggression and resulted in settling the Guiana boundary for all time:

In order that such examinations should be prosecuted in a thorough and satisfactory manner, I suggest that the Congress make an adequate appropriation for the expenses of a commission, to be appointed by the Executive, who shall make the necessary investigation and report upon the matter with the least possible delay. When such report is made and accepted it will, in my opinion, be the duty of the United States to resist by every means in its power, as a willful aggression upon its rights and interests, the appropriation by Great Britain of any lands or the exercise of governmental jurisdiction over any territory which after investigation we have determined of right belong to Venezuela.

In making these recommendations I am fully alive to the responsibility incurred and keenly realize all the consequences that may follow. I am, nevertheless, firm in my conviction that while it is a grievous thing to contemplate the two great English-speaking people of the world as being otherwise than friendly competitors in the onward march of civilization and strenuous and worthy rivals in all the arts of peace, there is no calamity which a great nation can invite which equals that which follows a supine submission to wrong and injustice and the consequent loss of national self-respect and honor beneath which are shielded and defended a people's safety and greatness.

Mr. Chairman, the Monroe Doctrine has been the great protective power against colonization and exploitation of two continents. The same nations as existed when Simon Bolivar and San Martin with ragged troops ended the power of the old conquistadors and set up republics, are still living. Some boundary changes of small consequence have come about by strife or arbitration.

The Monroe Doctrine has been the most powerful and potent instrument of peace in the history of the people of this world. I oppose any declaration of change or any attempt by nouns, verbs, or adjectives, to give it a new meaning.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. SCHIFFLER].

Mr. SCHIFFLER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to speak with reference to House Joint Resolution 506, which is now under discussion by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

As a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, this resolution was introduced on June 3, received a brief hearing on June 4, and supplemental hearing on June 5, and by a majority vote of such committee was favorably reported.

Such resolution passed the Senate on yesterday by a vote of 76 to 0. I am in complete sympathy with the object and purposes of such resolution, which primarily is to serve notice upon all nations throughout the world that the Monroe Doctrine is still considered as a fundamental policy of the United States; that non-American nations shall not be permitted to transfer any geographic region to another non-American nation.

The principle upon which the Monroe Doctrine was founded was announced by the Congress of the United States in 1811, when it was feared that Spain had designs upon Florida. As the result of the proclamation made at that time the acquisition of territory upon the American continents by non-American nations was forbidden by the United States Government.

Again, in 1823, the doctrine was proclaimed in emphatic language, as the result of which it has been recognized the world over that the acquisition by a non-American nation of territory on the American continents would be looked upon with disfavor by the United States.

At present several non-American countries own territory upon or adjacent to the American continents. The pronouncement at this time undoubtedly extends the provisions of the original Monroe Doctrine. The resolution under consideration announces that we will not recognize or acquiesce in any attempt to transfer any geographic region of this hemisphere from one non-American nation to another non-American nation.

This in effect states that notwithstanding that we in the past have stood firmly in opposition to the acquisition of territory upon the American continents or in the hemisphere, that we now extend such doctrine to prevent a transfer of such territory now held by a non-American power to another non-American power.

I cannot conceive that it was originally intended that the Monroe Doctrine was intended to embrace transactions such as those that are now included within the resolution before the House. The powers that have territory upon the American Continent acquired prior to the announcement of the Monroe Doctrine are further restricted and are not permitted to make a transfer of such territory to another non-American power. The resolution uses the term hemisphere. I hope that this term is not used in a sense as applied in the ordinary geographic understanding of the word. If such is the case, and if it is so applied, it will involve parts of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, as well as even a part of Iceland.

Reports have been current that Iceland has been subjected to German control and that German forces are now landing in Iceland for the purpose of making an attack upon Great Britain. If such is the case and the ordinary geographic conception of hemisphere adopted, we are heading toward war, and this is the initial step toward active military participation.

It has been explained to me that this interpretation is not to be adopted, and that the part of Iceland embraced within the geographic conception of this hemisphere is not to be used for the guidance of the Executive Department in executing the provisions of this resolution, but that such is to be applied in a practical manner, and as was contemplated at the time of the pronouncement of the Monroe Doctrine.

I am vitally interested in the preservation of the peace of our country. I shall do nothing directly or indirectly that will involve this Nation in active military participation in foreign wars; on the contrary, I do want to do everything that will defend and preserve the sovereignty of our beloved land.

In these times of hysteria and excitement it is for the leaders, and especially legislators to be calm and to endeavor to think out the consequences of each act. It is a time when we should think clearly and use our best judgment. I hope that this resolution will in no instance be provocative of discord or war, but will be universally accepted only as a reiteration of our age-old policy, to preserve America for Americans. A proclamation to the world that our Republican form of constitutional government, notwithstanding innuendos to the contrary, is not weak, but that there are fundamental rights for which we resolutely stand, in no sense a challenge to any nation, but a clear and unequivocal statement made with a friendly attitude to all nations.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD] 5 minutes.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, the Monroe Doctrine has been our traditional policy for over 100 years. We have always vigorously maintained that any attempt on the part of non-American powers to extend their system to any portion of North or South America or islands adjacent thereto would not only be considered as dangerous to our peace and security but to the other American republics as well.

It was distinctively an American doctrine. It is ours alone. It is unilateral in character and safeguards our own interests. It might be likened to a superdeclaration of independence. I, for one, deeply resent Hitler or any other dictator in Europe attempting to interpret the Monroe Doctrine for us, and telling us what our obligations are under it.

I am in full accord with the views of Daniel Webster when he declared in 1826 that the doctrine involved the honor of the country.

I look upon it—

He said—

as part of its treasures of reputation, and for one I intend to guard it.

And he added:

I look on the message of December 1823 as forming a bright page in our history. * * * It did honor to the sagacity of the Government, and I will not diminish that honor.

But just because you believe in the Monroe Doctrine is no reason why every Member of this House should not realize exactly what we are doing here today, and the full import and consequences of enacting this doctrine into statutory law.

What do we mean when we use the term "this hemisphere" and what does it include? The words "this hemisphere" and "Western Hemisphere" have been used interchangeably, so let us examine what territory these terms include.

First, where shall we start? The geographer of the State Department who appeared before our committee pointed out that there are three popular conceptions of the dividing line between the Western and Eastern Hemispheres. They are Greenwich, Ferro (one of the Canary group), and Paris. But for our purpose let us take Ferro as the dividing line. This places the Western Hemisphere within the meridians of 20° west longitude and 160° east longitude, the division line most frequently chosen by United States map makers. Within these limitations we find included the continents of North and South America, most of Greenland, part of Iceland, the Azores, the Cape Verde Islands, the South Shetland Islands, the Antarctic, New Zealand, the Samoan group, Clipperton, the Fiji group, the Solomon Islands, part of Siberia, and hundreds of other remote and inconsequential islands.

The Washington Daily News of June 13, in an editorial, described the extent of this bill as—

A responsibility that stretches from pole to pole, from ocean to ocean, and from Hell to breakfast.

Historically speaking, when Monroe sent his famous message to Congress he had in mind protecting the American continents and adjacent islands from intervention by non-American powers. The specific reasons were that he was afraid that the Holy Alliance might attempt to extend its sphere of influence in South America, and Russia in North America. Surely he did not have in mind the protection of the Azores, the Cape Verde Islands, or New Zealand.

Even modern geographers think of these groups as belonging to the Eastern Hemisphere. Let me quote part of a letter from Lawrence Martin, Chief of the Division of Maps of the Congressional Library, which appeared in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 2188:

In the Atlantic Ocean, however, the meridian of 20° puts the western tip of Iceland, as well as the whole of the Azores and the Cape Verde Islands, in the Western Hemisphere, although these islands have been generally regarded by geographers as parts of the Eastern Hemisphere. In the Pacific it puts eastern Russia (Siberia), as well as New Zealand and adjacent islands, in the Western Hemisphere, although they are generally regarded as parts of the Eastern Hemisphere.

If the Congress wants to include these groups under this bill, let them do so with full knowledge of what they are attempting to do. In case a European government should attempt to colonize or cause to be transferred some remote island of the Pacific, are we prepared to assert the Monroe Doctrine and, if necessary, go to war with some European power in its vindication? Let us be realistic. What if Germany should demand from France as part of the peace terms one of the Loyalty Islands, which are approximately 170° east longitude, thousands of miles across the Pacific. Are we prepared to go to war because of such a transfer? Are we going to apply the Monroe Doctrine to that part of Iceland that lies within the Western Hemisphere and not to the remainder? Are we going to apply this doctrine to almost all of Greenland but not to the northeast tip which lies within the Eastern Hemisphere? Such action, it seems to me, would be absurd, but these are just two of the results you will obtain by passage of the bill in its present form.

My attitude toward the Monroe Doctrine is most ably stated by my distinguished and learned colleague, JAMES A. SHANLEY, when he said in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 2187:

> As a matter of fact, I am thoroughly convinced that our entire Monroe Doctrine should be streamlined in the light of modern, up-to-date events. I would not surrender one vestige of our historic position, but simply revive and make corrections resultant from modern conditions.

I believe a great many of our difficulties could be eliminated if we would use the international date line, the one hundred and eightieth meridian, as one of the boundaries of the Western Hemisphere. This would eliminate New Zealand, the Loyalty Islands, the Solomon Islands, Siberia, and hundreds of other unimportant islands. And by not following strictly 20° west longitude we could by four departures exclude the Azores, the Cape Verde Islands, and, on the other hand, include the northeast tip of Greenland. And if we cared to do so we could include all of Iceland, as there are many good reasons for considering Iceland as part of the Western Hemisphere. Another possible solution would be instead of using the term "this hemisphere," why would it not be better to use "the continents of North America and South America and islands adjacent thereto"? Of course, the word "adjacent" is capable of a flexible definition, but why should not it be? Why should we determine the course of action that would govern us in the future until we know what the circumstances are at that time?

It is argued that we would not apply the Monroe Doctrine to remote regions of the Western Hemisphere; that traditionally the Monroe Doctrine is not so extensive in its scope, but really applies only to the North and South American Continents and islands adjacent thereto. But my chief objection to this bill is that the language does not so confine it. It states:

> That the United States would not recognize any transfer, and would not acquiesce in any attempt to transfer, any geographic region of this hemisphere from one non-American power to another non-American power.

If we mean less, why do not we say so and limit the application of this doctrine to the continents of North and South America and those islands adjacent whose transfer might endanger our security and peace? Why interpret the Monroe Doctrine as covering less than this hemisphere and at the same time include "any region in the Western Hemisphere" in the bill?

But no; we cannot do that. We must swallow this bill as it is—hook, line, and sinker—in our mad haste to warn some foreign nation of our approval of the Monroe Doctrine, a doctrine which all nations have known and understood for a period of over a hundred years.

While I personally do not believe that every portion of the Western Hemisphere, no matter how remote, should be included in this doctrine, yet if this Congress, in its wisdom, believes that it is for the best interests of our country to bring within the terms of the Monroe Doctrine every little dot in the Western Hemisphere, let it do so at least with eyes open and mindful of all the possible repercussions therefrom. But when we have finally decided upon a policy, let us be prepared to defend it against all comers with all the might and strength we possess.

Now let me turn to another phase of this bill. It provides that we can take any additional action which we see fit but that we shall consult with the other American republics. We should reserve the right to determine our own course of action as we see fit without being bound in any way by the actions of other countries. But the trouble with this policy is we do all the guaranteeing and the rest of the American republics merely do the consulting, and no one is even bound by such discussion. It is all right for us that we play the guardian role for our own security, but have not the other American republics grown up sufficiently so that they can and should help protect themselves? Is it not about time we find out how far these Latin nations are willing to go in the joint protection of the Western Hemisphere? Why should it be all one-sided? Why should not all the American republics be required to join in this common task which is for the common security of all?

Instead of treating the American republics as equals with equal responsibilities, this bill merely provides that after we determine our course of action we will tell them about it in a consultation, and they can sit back and do nothing. It is a mere gesture and nothing more.

I hope the action we take here today will be for the best interest of our country. The only sound reason that I can see for the enactment of this bill is that it may express to the world that the people's representatives, as well as the Executive and State Department approve of the Monroe Doctrine.

I only hope that if this bill is passed that such action will not be interpreted by our people, who are already deeply aroused by the world crisis, as another step toward war, and that it will not feed fuel to the existing hysteria. If that should be the result, it would be better that we did not pass this bill, for we are adding nothing to a doctrine that is already well known and has worked excellently for a period of over a hundred years. Sometimes it is the part of wisdom to leave well enough alone.

There is another part of the Monroe Doctrine that is not well known but is of the utmost importance. Monroe stated in his famous message:

> In the wars of the European powers, in matters relating to themselves, we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy, so to do. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced, that we resent injuries, or make preparation for our defense.

These words are just as true today as they were in 1823, and this Congress could do well to adopt them as its creed.

It is my sincere hope that in this crisis that all acts of Congress, all its energy, and all its efforts will be directed toward keeping our Nation at peace with all the world, and adequately preparing to defend our shores.

I believe that this bill, in its present form, goes far beyond the scope of the Monroe Doctrine as it has been interpreted for over a hundred years. I therefore feel I cannot support this bill unless amended. However, since a vote against this bill would be interpreted as a vote against the Monroe Doctrine and since I am in full accord with the Monroe Doctrine when limited to its proper scope, I feel my only alternative is to vote "present."

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT].

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, I expect to vote for the resolution now before this body because I am a firm believer in the Monroe Doctrine and I would not knowingly cast a vote which might be construed either at home or abroad as being opposed to the Monroe Doctrine. However, I agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTON] in his thought that resolutions are not the material from which formulae for national safety can be made at this particular time. What America needs today, in my opinion, is action rather than eloquent adjectives, either in congressional resolutions or in Presidental speeches.

In my opinion, this is a most inopportune time in which to bring in a resolution which would seek to write the Monroe Doctrine into legislative language after we have successfully upheld and interpreted it for 117 years. If, as its proponents contend, it goes no further than to reaffirm the present policy, it is unnecessary and superfluous. If it is to be construed as restricting the province of the Monroe Doctrine, it is an unfortunate manifestation of defeatism. If it extends the doctrine beyond its present interpretations, it is a dangerous and hastily considered change of American foreign policy. Looked at from any angle, it is in my opinion an exemplification of inept legislative practice and hastily devised legislation which does no credit to either the majority or minority members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Coming to us at a time like this, a vote against it might be construed as a vote of retreat before the totalitarian tyrants, and so most of us must perhaps vote for it, because no Member of this body would yield up one tiny bit of our sovereign rights to today's aggressors. But this resolution might better have been unwritten at this particular time, because, neither adding anything, clarifying anything, nor restricting anything, it is a dangerous tampering with a century-old doctrine which may later rise up to plague us all for our hurried action in these unsettled times.

I regret that no Member of the Senate saw fit to question the wisdom of such action at this time and that less than two pages of debate were devoted to its consideration. I regret that while many Senators declined to vote or failed to do so, none rose up to vote against consideration of this measure at this particular time. I feel that Senates of a more glorious day in American history would not so hastily and casually have passed upon such important legislation; yes, I feel that our predecessors in this hallowed House would also have considered long and well before writing into the confining language of a resolution a doctrine which has so long stood us in good stead as an enunciated policy by President Monroe.

Mr. Chairman, a part of our success in adhering to the Monroe Doctrine so successfully so long is, in my opinion, the very fact that we have never restricted its significance by legislative definition. The Monroe Doctrine has been the traditional policy of the greatest power on earth; part of its strength has been the very fact that ours was the right and ours the privilege of defining it as necessity directed and apply it as occasion demanded it. Now, to write a legislative definition whether it be to define identical rights which the Monroe Doctrine has always been interpreted as upholding or to weaken or expand those rights is at least to lose the great value of elasticity which has always been inherent in the Monroe Doctrine.

Now, all the world will know as much as does the United States just what is implied and indicated by this doctrine; gone will be our power of interpretation of this doctrine to apply to the changing conditions of an ever-changing world. For one, I shall vote for this resolution with great reluctance. I shall vote for it simply to lift my voice to tell dictators overseas that America, once faced with the legislative decision of reaffirming the Monroe Doctrine, will not in any way disfavor it. But if this decision had never been brought to this Congress at this time by a too easily stampeded Committee on Foreign Affairs and a too hastily conceived impulse, we should have retained the full strength of this immortal doctrine without having to sacrifice its elasticity of interpretation by today writing it into legislative definition. Yes; I shall vote for this resolution as the lesser of two evils now, but I regret that we are forced to hazard so much to gain so little through reaffirming a doctrine legislatively which is likely to be weaker and less effective after the reaffirmation than before it.

Mr. Chairman, I realize full well that many Members are today voting for this resolution because they have little confidence in our present Executive and because they fear his impetuosity and his ill-considered acts may jeopardize our country. However, I fear we cannot compensate for the President's snap decisions and impetuous acts by supplementing them with hastily considered acts on the part of ourselves. For Congress at this crucial time to tie the hands of the President by writing into law the Monroe Doctrine which for more than a century has been applied by the President and the State Department may be an intended or accidental reflection upon the judgment of those now in the White House and the office of Secretary of State, but in our hastily conceived and illy considered rush to pass this legislation it may also come to be a reflection on the calm judgment of this deliberative body.

FROM NOW ON LET US HAVE MORE ACTION AND FEWER ADJECTIVES

Mr. Chairman, I repeat, I shall support this resolution because to do otherwise might be to imply to greedy dictators overseas that we were retreating from our established policy, and I for one am not, and I know that most of you are not, but it is unfortunate that when action is so badly needed we fumble around ineptly trying to give meaning to an American policy 117 years of age which we are far more likely to confuse by this action than we are likely to confirm the strength of its application. But when we have finished with this vote let us have no more of hastily devised resolutions and sparkling adjectives; let us settle down to the serious business of developing preparedness and policies which will defend this doctrine and spend less of our time defining it. Not adjectives but action will suffice to make America strong at this hour when we dare not permit America to be weak.

We need action in preparedness, action in curtailing "fifth column" activities, action in strengthening Pan American friendship and crystallizing and consolidating Pan American ideals.

In this connection, I would like to call attention to language used by President Monroe on December 2, 1823, in presenting this doctrine to the Congress. He stated at that time:

> The occasion has been judged proper for asserting as a principle in which the rights and interests of the United States are involved, that the American Continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintain, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European powers.
> We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere. But with the governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any manner their destiny, by any European power in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States.

WE WANT NO INVASIONS OF EITHER ARMIES OR "ISMS"

I call attention especially to the phrase "to extend their system," referring to the systems of European governments. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the invasion of ideals and "isms" can be just as dangerous and just as permanently detrimental to America and democracy as the invasion of armies. I hope that Congress, therefore, will work out a preparedness program before adjournment that will extend itself far enough to include the defense of this hemisphere against invasion of un-American ideals in any place where that invasion may be found between Alaska and Cape Horn.

When we find that the invasion of the systems sponsored by the Nazi, the Communists, and the bunds are creeping into this country, we recognize that that is also contrary to the spirit if not the actual language of the Monroe Doctrine.

We should go further today, in my opinion, and rather than weakly reaffirming our position that we are going to protect the Western Hemisphere against aggressors from Europe and Asia who might try to invade this hemisphere, we should go so far as to rededicate ourselves to an effort to clean out and to keep out the invasion of European and Asiatic ideals and "isms" which are trying to eat into the foundations of our Government, and of the American republics, where they are found in the Western Hemisphere.

A JOB FOR THE PAN AMERICAN UNION

I would like to suggest that the gentleman from Texas, MARTIN DIES, for example, who has made some splendid suggestions from time to time about cleaning out un-Americanism in America, submit to the Pan American Union downtown, which brings together the republics of the Western Hemisphere, a proposal to study matters of primary interest to this hemisphere, and that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] suggest to them some ways and means, some specific devices, that will help to eliminate un-American activities which may be found any place in North or South America.

Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, pro-Americanism is too much of a fetish with me but in trying times like these I doubt that any of us can be too pro-American. I despise and detest the pagan doctrines of nazi-ism, fascism, and communism with all the strength at my command. I abhor their devotion to the doctrine that the citizen is but a creature of the state. I deny their claims that nations can be strong only as they rally around an individual dictator and pay homage to his authority. I decry their method of turning back the clock of civilization by promoting wars abroad and projecting power politics at home. I hope that on the Western Hemisphere we shall never see the time when these doctrines "extend their system," as President Monroe so prophetically cautioned his confederates. It is not alone against the possibility of an extension by armed forces, great ships, and flying fortresses that this country must guard itself and that this hemisphere must prepare against. It is equally, and perhaps especially, against an attempt to "extend their system" by the Trojan-horse technique of communism and the "fifth column" devices of nazi-ism and fascism. Military men correctly advise us that with all our speed in voting new appropriations it will be many months and perhaps several years before we can make America sufficienty strong in military might, but there is nothing but our own lethargy which can prevent us from making America strong, before adjournment of this Congress, in the matter of loyalty among our people and devotion to the ideals of Americanism among those who would remain here and retain freedom to enjoy the protection of this Government.

THIS CONGRESS SHOULD ACT TO STAMP OUT UN-AMERICANISM NOW

This Congress should pass new legislation to stamp out Nazi bunds and communistic cells and fascistic fronts; it should take every constitutional means to rid America at once of aliens whose first patriotic devotion is to foreign governments or foreign systems. The gentleman from Texas, Congressman MARTIN DIES, and his splendid Committee for the Investigation of Un-American Activities have done much to awaken America to dangers of subversive agents in this country, despite the criticism of too many sophisticates, too many pseudo liberals, and too many Federal officials speaking from places of too high authority. Perhaps when the whole book is written, President Roosevelt will regret most of all his official acts and statements, his reference to the Dies committee in its exposé of subversive sympathizers when he referred to it as "a sordid procedure." At least I credit the President with that much power of honest self-analysis.

Let us wait no longer before passing legislation based upon the findings of the Dies committee. Why tolerate the traitorous activities of bundsters, Communists, and Fascists, now that the evidence of their existence is so clearly before us, the record of their destructive effect upon national unity so positively written in the tortuous news from European fronts, and the devices for curtailing their effectiveness in America so definitely presented to this body by concrete legislative suggestions from the men who know the most of how these foreign fakers operate? Let us listen to no urgent administrative requests that we adjourn. Let us act vigorously and thoroughly now to disband these alien groups and to deport those who have perpetrated them.

Both the least and the most that we can and should do to aliens in America who would teach the synthetic glamour of nazi-ism, communism, and fascism is to deport these deluded patriots back to the lands from whence they came so they can experience the practice of the nefarious arts of which they preach. They can be sure we are never going to adopt these foreign formulae of one-man indispensability in America, so the sooner they are deported the happier they should be. This much at least we know—the sooner they are deported the happier and safer we shall be. [Applause.]

NEEDED!—"PAN-AMERICAN PRO-AMERICANISM"

Mr. Chairman, I have fought Hitlerism, Stalinism, and Mussolini-ism in and out of Congress. I began the fight in my own State nearly 7 years ago in speeches before high-school commencement audiences, service clubs, community groups, and wherever I could find an audience. In 1936 I devoted the better part of a whole political campaign to fighting subversive influences in America and, although defeated and accused of setting up "straw men" at which to shoot, I have never stopped the fight, and I shall never stop it until America is rid of these "peddlers of piffle" who would import alien ideas of government into America to becloud our great ideal of a fair chance for a free people through self-government. I have probably given more speeches against these pagan philosophies of European isms by two times over than any other individual in my State, and among my proudest votes in Congress are those which I cast to continue the Dies committee so that sufficient evidence could be unearthed to forever expose and exclude nazi-ism, fascism, and communism from America. Therefore, I venture to insist today that we do more than pass a resolution. I hope we may rededicate ourselves fervently to a crusade against these foreign "isms," both in North and South America. Let us cooperate with our southern neighbors in advising them what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] has learned about how these groups have operated here. This will help them protect themselves against such an invasion of unholy ideals in South America.

I think the time has come when America needs a program of "Pan American pro-Americanism" which will manifest itself throughout the Western Hemisphere.

WE NEED ACTION TOWARD AN "ALL-AMERICAN AXIS"

I would also like to suggest to the War Department that they confer with these same Pan American officials from the standpoint of working out a mutually advantageous defense program. As we rededicate ourselves to the Monroe Doctrine, we can prevent this from becoming a mere gesture vitiated by dangerous and inexpedient possibilities if we rededicate ourselves to the principle of "one for all and all for one" in some practical program of mutual helpfulness. Let us work in harmony and in close contact with these South American republics, all of which are capable of giving us assistance and to all of whom we are pledging our protection and help in tightening, strengthening, and holding together a defense system for the Western Hemisphere. [Applause.]

This Pan American Union, it seems to me, offers a splendid opportunity for constructive and successful action by which we are going to be able to help drive out of the Western Hemisphere the pagan idealism which has attempted to invade this hemisphere of freedom, Christianity, and peace. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GILLIE] such time as he may desire to use.

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Chairman, for a clearer understanding of the historical background of the Monroe Doctrine, and the resolution under discussion today, I recommend careful reading of the following letter which Thomas Jefferson wrote to President Monroe on October 26, 1823, more than a month before Monroe embodied his famous doctrine in a message to Congress.

Jefferson's letter bears out the fact that the so-called Monroe Doctrine was not Monroe's idea alone but the consensus of opinion of many of the great minds of Monroe's time.

JEFFERSON'S LETTER TO MONROE

The question presented by the letters you have sent me is the most momentous which has ever been offered to my contemplation since that of independence. That made us a nation, this sets our compass and points the course which we are to steer through the ocean of time opening on us. And never could we embark on it under circumstances more auspicious. Our first and fundamental maxim should be, never to entangle ourselves in the broils of Europe. Our second, never to suffer Europe to intermeddle with cis-Atlantic affairs. America, North and South, has a set of interests distinct from those of Europe, and peculiarly her own. She should therefore have a system of her own, separate and apart from that of Europe. While the last is laboring to become the domicile of despotism, our endeavor should surely be, to make our hemisphere that of freedom. One nation, most of all, could disturb us in this pursuit; she now offers to lead, aid, and accompany us in it. By acceding to her proposition, we detach her from the band of despots, bring her mighty weight into the scale of free government, and emancipate a continent at one strike which might otherwise linger long in doubt and difficulty. Great Britain is the nation which can do us the most harm of any one, or all, on earth; and with her on our side we need not fear the whole world. With her then we should the most sedulously cherish a cordial friendship; and nothing would tend more to knit our affections than to be fighting once more, side by side, in the same cause. Not that I would purchase even her amity at the price of taking part in her wars. But the war in which the present proposition might engage us, should that be its consequence, is not her war, but ours. Its object is to introduce and to establish the American system, of keeping out of our land all foreign powers, of never permitting those of Europe to intermeddle with the affairs of our nations. It is to maintain our own principle, not to depart from it. And if, to facilitate this, we can effect a division in the body of the European powers, and draw over to our side its most powerful member, surely we should do it. But I am clearly of Mr. Canning's opinion that it will prevent, instead of provoking war. With Great Britain withdrawn from their scale and shifted into that of our two continents. All Europe combined would not undertake such a war, for how would they propose to get at either enemy without superior fleets? Nor is the occasion to be slighted which this proposition offers of declaring our protest against the atrocious violations of the rights of nations, by the interference of any one in the internal affairs of another so flagitiously begun by Bonaparte, and now continued by the equally lawless alliance, calling itself holy.

But we have first to ask ourselves a question. Do we wish to acquire to our own confederacy any one or more of the Spanish provinces? I candidly confess that I have ever looked on Cuba as the most interesting addition which could ever be made to our system of States. The control which, with Florida point, this island would give us over the Gulf of Mexico, and the countries, and the isthmus bordering on it, as well as all those whose waters flow into it, would fill up the measure of our political well-being. Yet, as I am sensible that this can never be obtained, even with her own consent, but by war; and its independence, which is our second interest (and especially its independence of England) can be secured without it, I have no hesitation in abandoning my first wish to future chances, and accepting its independence with peace, and the friendship of England, rather than its association at the expense of war and her enmity.

I could honestly therefore join in the declaration proposed that we aim not at the acquisition of any of those possessions, that we will not stand in the way of any amicable arrangement between them and the mother country, but that we will oppose with all our means, the forcible interposition of any other power, as auxiliary, stipendiary, or under any other form or pretext and most especially their transfer to any power by conquest, cession, or acquisition in any other way. I should think it therefore advisable that the Executive should encourage the British Government to a continuance in the dispositions expressed in these letters, by an assurance of his concurrence with them as far as his authority goes, and that as it may lead to war, the declaration of which requires an act of Congress, the case shall be laid before them for consideration at their first meeting, and under the reasonable aspect in which it is seen by himself.

I have been so long weaned from political subjects, and have so long ceased to take any interest in them, that I am sensible I am not qualified to offer opinions on them worthy of any attention. But the question now proposed involves consequences so lasting, and effects so decisive of our future destinies, as to rekindle all the interest I have heretofore felt on such occasions, and to induce me to the hazard of opinions, which will prove only my wish to contribute still my might toward anything which may be useful to our country, and praying you to accept it at only what it is worth, I add the assurance of my constant and affectionate friendship and respect.

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, for many weeks this possible action has troubled me. On June 3, I placed certain remarks in the RECORD and I will read three sentences from that statement:

Gradually the seriousness of the Monroe Doctrine casts its shadow upon us. Seemingly nearly all who venture to express opinions advise assuming so-called protectorate over all foreign possessions in this hemisphere. With our eyes open and only with full realization of its fateful results must this step be taken.

To me this is a fateful resolution. It may be reiteration, it may be reaffirmation; but if it is only reaffirmation it comes at a very distressing moment. It should have been made many months ago. The resolution refers to certain conferences with other South American nations and certain conferences with foreign ministers. It was understood that if the time came when such transfer was contemplated we would sit down and consult with those nations. But now we proceed to pass this resolution saying "that we will not recognize or acquiesce in any non-American nation taking title to territory now belonging to other non-American nations." We say this before we consult with these other South American nations. We may dread to think what our consultations may amount to when we seek agreement with those nations that have not always, and probably do not now, wholly subscribe to the many phases of what we have considered to be our Monroe Doctrine. But we pass this resolution and then we will consult with those neighbors after our declaration of policy, expecting and demanding that they acquiesce.

Shall I say I will not recognize or acquiesce in certain transferees taking title to the land next to mine? Does that mean that I will not speak to him if he takes possession or that I will have no business with him, but that I will do nothing about it? Of course, if he occupies it, having acquired title, either by duress or exchange, should I resist by force his taking possession? Is that what this resolution intends to say? We must read between the lines.

You have told your people and so have I that we would not send any boys to fight on foreign soil. Did you mean that you would make no aggressive act against a foreign nation? Does this mean that we will fight with a foreign nation if it attempts to take possession of that which it may have legal right to possess? Is this an empty policy as declared by us?

I say to you again this is a fateful resolution. Probably none of us will see fit to vote against it. We believe in the Monroe Doctrine. It is dreadfully inopportune at this particular moment from my viewpoint. Did the Committee on Foreign Affairs consult with our generals and our admirals to see if they were ready to enforce it? I heard nothing said about that.

The resolution states here that they will not only consult with them, but "in addition to other measures, consult with the other powers." Are you going to take some warlike measures immediately and before you consult with these other powers? Of such a resolution I may not be able to see very clearly. Perhaps my mind does not allow me to see it clearly but certainly I can read. As I have said once before, some people can write although they cannot read what they have written. You have written something here which I doubt that you can read fully the whole and complete danger involved. I am greatly disturbed. I would almost wish to vote "present" and avoid responsibility. I am just as patriotic, I think, as you, and I think I understand the policy of the Monroe Doctrine, but this, I claim, is more than reaffirmation. This is an expansion placed in actual law and placed there before you consult with these neighbors with whom you declared you would consult with before you would make such a decision. Will these other nations agree to this declaration of policy or do you intend to force them to do so? [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO].

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, like many other Members of this body, I am going to support this resolution, but section 1 raises in my mind a very grave question, and coming, as it does, at this critical time, this Nation may be confronted with a reality and not a theory. The resolution presents a great responsibility to every Member of this House. I believe it unwise to take this step now in the face of a war-mad world. The language in section 1 reads:

The United States would not recognize any transfer, and would not acquiesce in any attempt to transfer, any geographic region of this hemisphere from one non-American power to another non-American power.

The thought has been going through my mind, what will be the position of the United States if the islands that once belonged to Belgium, the Netherlands, to Holland, and to France in this hemisphere shall by force of arms become the possessions of the German Empire, or the German Reich.

If such should be the case, the United States would be compelled to acquiesce in such transfer and surrender its long-established policy of the Monroe Doctrine or be ready to wage war to maintain it. If the mother countries of the islands in or near this Western Hemisphere should cease to exist and the title to them could not be transferred as set out in section 1 of the resolution before us, to whom would they belong? They will become orphans and we may be the foster parent.

Are we attempting to freeze the sovereignty of those islands as they are now? If they do become the possessions of the German Reich by reason of conquest of arms, what are we going to do about it? This resolution says that we will not acquiesce in such transfer, and a letter from Mr. Cordell Hull, Secretary of State, says that we will then consult with our southern neighbors "in addition to other measures" to protect our interests. Suppose that our southern neighbors do not take the same attitude toward such transfer as we do and that we are left alone. Then what will be the position of the United States? We will have but one of two choices to make. We can either defend the Monroe Doctrine as we have always insisted we would, and be prepared to fight to maintain it or surrender it.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. Yes. I yield to my friend, the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee.

Mr. BLOOM. We have not recognized the conquest of Poland or Czechoslovakia, of Austria, Holland, Belgium, or Denmark or Norway, have we in any way?

Mr. DONDERO. The question that the gentleman raises does not fit the case.

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman says that we will have to recognize them, or else.

Mr. DONDERO. I am referring to islands that those countries once owned or now own in the Western Hemisphere, if they are taken over by right of conquest, as seem probable at the present moment, what will we do about it in that case?

Mr. BLOOM. Has not Belgium been taken over by right of conquest?

Mr. DONDERO. But that is a country in Europe. It has no application to the islands in the western world.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. Yes.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Does the gentleman contend for 1 minute, whether we pass this resolution or not, we would acquiesce in Germany taking over the island of Curaçao, which now belongs to Holland? I think it is clear that we would not acquiesce, whether we pass this resolution or not, if they attempted to take over anything by right of conquest or in any other way.

Mr. DONDERO. Suppose it is taken over and we do not acquiesce, what, then, are you going to do about it? Are you going to insist upon purchasing the island or are you going to take it by conquest? If you do, then you are taking a step toward war and that is the question in my mind that comes at this time, when perhaps it should not be raised in this country.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Does the gentleman know what we did in 1811 when we were a small country? We just walked in and took Florida until they got through fighting over it.

Mr. DONDERO. We did, but the Monroe Doctrine was not in existence in 1811. It did not come into being until about 1823.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. DONDERO. Yes.

Mr. BLOOM. I just want to get into the RECORD at this point that I am very glad that my colleague from Ohio [Mr. VORYS] and myself, agree at least on one point.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. Yes.

Mr. FISH. I understand the gentleman's position, but it seems to me in this critical situation it is about time that we got a little hard boiled ourselves, and that we serve notice on the world of exactly what we meant, and if they want to come over here in defiance of an act of Congress and the Monroe Doctrine, then they come over at their own risk, but I think they will recognize our language, and not a few soft words, evading it and pussyfooting. If we mean what we say, let us say it, and let us say it in a hard-boiled way.

Mr. DONDERO. And my answer to that is that we are taking an aggressive step today. Ownership or possession by one or more non-American countries of islands in this hemisphere may or may not be as dangerous or as safe to our peace and national security as the ownership and possession of such islands by any other foreign power or powers. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1½ minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I cannot say very much in a minute and a half, and yet for the life of me I cannot see where we have very much to gain by passing this resolution. It seems to me that the Monroe Doctrine is our doctrine, and that it should be interpreted by the American people as conditions arise. Now that the resolution is here I shall vote for it, but in my opinion it ought not be here at this time.

I cannot see one single advantage at this time in passing this resolution. I think as the various exigencies arise the American Government will interpret the Monroe Doctrine. Naturally it will do it for its own protection, but I question today very much the wisdom of the language in this particular resolution. I think we are doing just what we should not do; that is, assume a very belligerent attitude, before we know all the facts and before all the facts are developed. I think it would be far safer to let the Monroe Doctrine stand and then when the time comes to act upon that Monroe Doctrine, to act as the circumstances direct at that time. Adequate preparedness is a condition precedent to any effective defense of the Monroe Doctrine or of a defiant resolution such as the one now before the House. The country desires prompt action in providing for national defense, not so many resolutions and not quite so much bluster and talk. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILDAY].

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, as the angry flames of war crash through Europe with fury, speed, and decisiveness never known in the history of the world, our American people are brought face to face with the stern realities of war. More important, they wonder where they may be in the present condition of things and what may be their position when the result is finally known. A great feeling of uncertainty and mental turmoil has seized our people. I wish that some word of mine could relieve the distress, still more that some act on my part might contribute to a removal of the cause of that distress. However, we must all realize now that the time for wishful thinking has passed, the time for believing in or hoping for miracles is gone. Stern reality is our future.

My greatest desire is to see my country remain at peace. The last thing I want to happen is to see our young manhood march off to war. My every effort will be devoted to the prevention of war and to the peace and security of my Nation. In these times a great load of responsibility has fallen upon the shoulders of those charged with the affairs of our Nation.

In a war-torn world we cannot be so foolish as to believe that we can sit by in perfect safety. No matter what may be the result of the war, the United States must enter upon a new era in her history. We are young insofar as the lives of nations go. On the other hand, the days of youth and freedom from responsibility have gone. We are the strongest nation upon the Western Hemisphere. Only in the Western Hemisphere is there now peace. Only here is there guaranteed and observed the great liberties of the people. Here alone is there freedom of conscience, of speech, and of the press. This Nation must take on the full responsibility of preserving those liberties to this hemisphere and to all of the people in this hemisphere. This need not be because of any sentimental thought that we should provide for such liberties for the peoples of this hemisphere, though that would be ample justification.

It is dictated, however, by a far more basic and fundamental reason. It is required because of the very first law of Nature—self-preservation. We must assume the burden of preventing the implanting of foreign ideologies upon these two continents. We must prevent the infiltration of these ideologies. But, above all, we must be in a position to repulse, by force if needs be, any foreign power which might seek to invade any of the countries of North, Central, or South America. We must do so for our own protection. We must do so for our own security. We must do so to preserve our own lives.

Let no person be shocked by this position. It is not new in the life of the United States. It is a policy to which we have long been committed. As a matter of fact, it is a policy of which we have long boasted; it is one of the great basic things in the Nation of which we are proud. It has existed since the 2d day of December 1823, when President James Monroe delivered his seventh annual message to the Congress of the United States. It is the Monroe Doctrine. It will be well for us to pause long enough to contemplate what that wise President of these United States had to say. In so doing we are again challenged by the prophetic vision of the early fathers of our Nation. This language is from that message, and therefore from the declaration of the Monroe Doctrine; it is a good policy for today:

> In the wars of the European powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparation for our defense. With the movements in this hemisphere we are of necessity more immediately connected, and by causes which must be obvious to all enlightened and impartial observers.

I subscribe to every word contained in that declaration. All good Americans approve and applaud that statement as a declaration of present policy as desirable now as it was in 1823. Then President Monroe proceeded with this language:

> We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere. But with the governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European power in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States.

That, my fellow Americans, is the Monroe Doctrine of which you and I have long boasted. The pending resolution is but a present-day declaration of the doctrine. Enforcement of the doctrine is as vitally important to the personal welfare of each and every American today as it was in 1823. In my humble opinion it is of more importance today than ever. Since it was proclaimed we have grown from a nation which was young and weak, having just passed through a war in which our own country was invaded and our own Capital City and Capitol Building destroyed. Now we are the richest and most powerful Nation in the world. We possess everything that will cause longing and covetous eyes to be cast upon us. More than half of the mined gold in the world is within our borders and a large percentage of the mined silver. Every natural resource that would cause an invading nation to seek to possess our land is here.

Our pathway is clear. We have no choice. We must put this Nation in such condition that no nation, however strong, will seek to invade our shores. In addition, and perhaps more necessary than preparation for attempted invasion, we must be prepared to live up to every word, every sentence, every line, and every principle announced in the Monroe Doctrine. This will mean that no nation can take offense at our action, for we are but carrying out our announced policy—a policy respected and observed by the nations of the world for 117 years. When prepared to maintain and defend this position we can be far more content that no nation, I care not how flushed with victory over others, will attempt to attack us or dispute our claim to the freedom of these Americas from European ideologies. Remember, force fears only force.

Here in Washington feverish efforts are being made to accomplish just such a program. I am glad that hysteria has not seized Washington. The War and Navy Departments are going about their important tasks of providing for the defense of this Nation in a vigorous and energetic fashion, still with a calm and sober manner which characterizes the man trained in military affairs.

Congress, and especially the committees charged with the national defense, is awake to the condition. Without fanfare, devoid of sensationalism and showmanship, this Congress is discharging its duty to the United States. There is but one issue here, it is the defense of our own Nation and our own people. There is the determination that our American people shall not be found unprepared and unprotected as were some of the peoples of Europe. This burden weighs heavily upon each and every one of us. Time for expected adjournment draws near. The national conventions of the two political parties will soon be held.

However, we are working day and night on the business in hand. As individuals, we in the Congress are anxious to adjourn and return to our homes. We have been in Washington for a long time now. Many personal interests challenge us at home. Personally, there are reasons for me to want to be in my district. On the other hand, I feel that we should stay here so long as there is any reasonable necessity for our presence. Major nations are being conquered in but a few days. We should stay here until the program for the defense of our Nation is thoroughly formulated and well under way. I appreciate membership in the Congress of the United States. But let me say here and now that my personal welfare, my political welfare, my career, and my future are as nothing to me when the welfare of my Nation is involved. Therefore I shall stay at my post of duty no matter what may be my personal interests or desires until I know that the program for the defense of my Nation is secure. If this means the termination of my career here, well and good, my conscience will be the easier because of duty performed.

This is our own, our native land. As each day passes we must be impressed with the fact that this land of ours is thrice blessed with freedom and with liberty. During these trying times we must resolve that this Nation shall be protected, that her institutions must be preserved, that our children and our children's children may enjoy the blessings which our forefathers captured and passed on to us for our enjoyment.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this resolution—House Joint Resolution 556—is to reaffirm at this critical time in world affairs the long-standing policy of this Government with reference to the extension to this hemisphere by non-American states of their systems and political institutions. This is done by the first paragraph of the resolution, which states that the United States would not recognize any transfer and would not acquiesce in any attempt to transfer any geographic region of this hemisphere from one non-American power to another non-American power. This paragraph would apply not only to an actual transfer or an attempt to transfer a region but would also apply to any exercise of control over such a region.

The second paragraph states that if such a transfer or attempt to transfer should appear likely, the United States—

> Shall, in addition to other measures, immediately consult with the other American republics to determine upon the steps which should be taken to safeguard their common interests.

This latter provision contemplates consultation in conformity with the Convention for the Maintenance of Peace, signed at Buenos Aires in 1936, the Declaration of Lima of 1938, and the Resolution of the American Republics, signed at Panama in 1939, all referred to in the preamble. It would not prevent the United States unilaterally from taking such measures as it may see fit to take under the circumstances obtaining at the moment. The United States, with or without the adoption of the proposed resolution, is, of course, a free agent and may, whenever circumstances require, take such steps as may be necessary or desirable to prevent foreign inroads in this hemisphere.

In his farewell address in 1796, President Washington admonished us "against the insidious wiles of foreign influence," stating that against such wiles "the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government."

On a number of occasions during our early history this Government announced that it would be unwilling to see territory in this hemisphere in the hands of European states transferred by them to other European states.

In 1801 the American Minister to England, Rufus King, reported to the Secretary of State that he had had a conversation with Lord Hawkesbury with reference to the reported cession of the Floridas by Spain to France, and that—

The purport of what I said was that we are contented that the Floridas remain in the hands of Spain but should not be willing to see them transferred, except to ourselves.

On February 29, 1808, President Jefferson made a similar statement with respect to Spanish possessions in this hemisphere. He stated that we would be "very unwilling to see them in that (the possession) of either France or England, politically or commercially. We consider their interests and ours as the same, and that the object of both must be to exclude all European influence from this hemisphere."

In keeping with this previously declared policy, President Monroe in his annual message to Congress, December 2, 1823, announced a doctrine, since referred to as the Monroe Doctrine, stating among other things that:

* * * the occasion has been judged proper for asserting as a principle in which the rights and interests of the United States are involved, that the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintain, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European powers.

He also stated:

We owe it, therefore, to candor, and to amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers, to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere. * * *

It is impossible that the Allied Powers should extend their political system to any portion of either continent without endangering our peace and happiness; nor can anyone believe that our southern brethren, if left to themselves, would adopt it of their own accord. It is equally impossible, therefore, that we should behold such interposition, in any form, with indifference. * * *

In 1912, when rumors were abroad that a corporation was about to obtain a concession in Magdalena Bay on the coast of Lower California and that such concession would probably be used as a naval base by a foreign government, Senator Lodge introduced a resolution, which the Senate adopted by the overwhelming vote of 51 to 4, on August 2, 1912, reading as follows:

Resolved, That when any harbor or other place in the American continents is so situated that the occupation thereof for naval or military purposes might threaten the communications or the safety of the United States, the Government of the United States could not see without grave concern the possession of such harbor or other place by any corporation or association which has such a relation to another government, not American, as to give that government practical power or control for national purposes.

In commenting upon the resolution Senator Lodge stated:

This resolution rests on a generally accepted principle of the law of nations older than the Monroe Doctrine. It rests on the principle that every nation has a right to protect its own safety, and that if it feels that the possession by a foreign power, for military or naval purposes, of any given harbor or place is prejudicial to its safety, it is its duty as well as its right to interfere.

* * * * * * *

The Monroe Doctrine was, of course, an extension in our own interests of this underlying principle—the right of every nation to provide for its own safety. The Monroe Doctrine, as we all know, was applied, so far as the taking possession of territory was concerned, to its being open to further colonization, and naturally did not touch upon the precise point involved here. But, without any Monroe Doctrine the possession of a harbor such as that of Magdalena Bay, which has led to this resolution, would render it necessary, I think, to make some declaration covering a case where a corporation or association was involved.

In this particular case it became apparent from the inquiries made by the committee and by the administration that no government was concerned in taking possession of Magdalena Bay; but, it also became apparent that those persons who held control of the Mexican concession, which included the land about Magdalena Bay, were engaged in negotiations, which have not yet been completed, certainly, but which have only been tentative, looking to the sale of that bay, and the land about it, to a corporation either created or authorized by a foreign government, or in which the stock was largely held or controlled by foreigners.

* * * * * * *

The resolution is merely a statement of policy, allied to the Monroe Doctrine, of course, but not necessarily dependent upon it or growing out of it. * * * It seemed to the committee that it was very wise to make this statement of policy at this time, when it can give offense to no one and makes the position of the United States clear.

At the present moment the situation in Europe is chaotic to say the least. We do not know what the final outcome may be nor do we know what plans may be in mind with respect to the shifting of territory, but we do know what our long-established policy has been concerning the acquisition of territory in this hemisphere by non-American powers, and the establishment of their systems herein. With the admonition of President Washington against the insidious wiles of foreign influence we are in hearty accord. We have all these things clearly in mind, and the purpose of this resolution is to remind those foreign powers that our position has not been altered. It is preferable that this reminder should be given in advance of any overt act than that we should be confronted with an accomplished situation which might be more difficult to deal with later than now. The resolution is not directed at any one power but at any and all non-American powers which may be casting eyes in the direction of this hemisphere. It is not a challenge or a move in the direction of war, but, quite the contrary, it is a step taken in advance for the purpose of avoiding possible difficulties which might arise if foreign powers were allowed to believe that there has been any change in our policy in these respects. The resolution is but a reiteration of our time-honored policy. Its adoption is timely, and is for the benefit of those who may think that there has been some deviation on our part from this policy. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I want the RECORD to show that we have yielded back 49½ minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., (1) That the United States would not recognize any transfer, and would not acquiesce in any attempt to transfer, any geographic region of the Western Hemisphere from one non-American power to another non-American power; and

(2) That if such transfer or attempt to transfer should appear likely, the United States shall, in addition to other measures, immediately consult with the other American republics to determine upon the steps which should be taken to safeguard their common interests.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "of", strike out "the Western Hemisphere" and insert "this hemisphere."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, my very dear and close friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] seems to differ vitally with me on this proposal. This is an administration measure. I do not say that I would have advised bringing it up, but it passed the Senate unanimously and the administration wants it. It is before the House and that is why I am supporting it. I do not know whether it was wise to bring it up in the first instance or not, but being here I think the House should realize that tremendous changes have occurred in the world in the last few years.

When the Monroe Doctrine was written there were no submarines and there were no airplanes. We had nothing to fear, this great country of ours, from any foreign nation whatsoever. But since airplanes have been invented and since submarines have been discovered, any unfriendly nation, any nation with a different political system that might be opposed to ours, or any nation that had any kind of a design on us, which owned any one of those islands could use them against us for airplane bases, for submarine bases, and against the Panama Canal. The whole situation has changed. Therefore, it may be advisable to reaffirm the Monroe Doctrine and to show exactly what we mean to all of the other nations of the world, that we are deliberately opposed to the transfer of any of those non-American possessions to any other non-American country.

That is simply the issue before us. Conditons have changed. When the gentleman from New York talks about the Monroe Doctrine alone he fails to realize that this situation with which we are confronted is critical, and that our very existence is at stake. I do not think anybody who knows the facts would even compromise in any way in having any possibly unfriendly nation owning any single one of these islands that might be directed against us and against the Panama Canal and used by modern weapons of warfare.

That is the reason I rose at this time, to point out that conditions have changed.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. The gentleman said "deal with them as conditions arise." The condition is now arising, is it not, at this time?

Mr. FISH. It has arisen and nobody knows what will happen within the next week or next month.

Mr. BENDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. BENDER. Are we in a position now to deal with them? Are we prepared? Are we ready to deal?

Mr. FISH. I am glad the gentleman asked that. I wish everybody else would ask it everyday, because the people back home are under the impression that we, the greatest Nation in the world, are utterly defenseless; that we are like Abyssinia or China. All you have to do is to ask the chairman of our House Committee on Naval Affairs, who is perhaps the greatest exponent of a big Navy in this country and who has done a splendid job in building up the Navy. He said the other day that the United States has the greatest, the largest, the most efficient, and the best Navy in the world today. [Applause.] What is the use of all this craven talk? We fear no country with a navy of that kind and we propose to continue to have the greatest Navy in the world. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, we have heard a great number of words explaining the Monroe Doctrine. I want to quote one sentence from Elihu Root, which sums up the Monroe Doctrine:

> The Doctrine is not international law, but it rests upon the right of self-protection.

In other words, this resolution and the Monroe Doctrine that came into being at the time when diplomacy meant something, when doctrines meant something, actually means that we have to use force to keep out of this continent any country that threatens our sovereignty, that we have to use force to dislodge any country that gets a foothold in this hemisphere.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], who just relinquished the floor, tried to reassure us that we had adequate protection. Thanks to our President we have an adequate Navy or will have as soon as we can build it. Every day new ships are launched or near completion. This is the backbone of our defense to preserve the Monroe Doctrine. I hope the Members who today have urged us to vote for this measure will be as ready to vote for conscription when we are presented with that inevitable vote in the near future. By that I mean conscription of industry and resources as well as men. At the present time with the very limited increases we have made the result is what? We have raised the Marines now to the total of 34,000 men. That is our answer to these dictator nations that threaten our sovereignty. Thirty-four thousand Marines. Enough perhaps to dislodge an enemy in one island in the Caribbean. We have talked about raising our Army to 400,000 men—less than the army of any one of the little countries that went under overnight.

I wish I could satisfy my conscience that this Congress by voting the appropriations we have recently voted have provided all that we can provide to protect this Nation. We cannot be lazy and fat and selfish and say we will buy this protection, we will hire a professional force to do it, we will not have our lives or our businesses interrupted, we will carry on our business as usual, we will not take part in a national-defense program. I am not one who wants this Congress to stay here to harass the President. The President is going to have to be given more power to mobilize industry, to mobilize our men, to use these great natural resources and abilities this Nation has, or we are not going to be able to exist in a world that is driven by one-man governments that can utilize every resource within a country. This Congress should realize that on it rests the responsibility of whether democracy can live, whether we are going to play politics with a situation that calls for the best resources and the use of the best minds of this Nation. If you distrust our great leader—and I do not—then give that power to a joint board, but give it to somebody that this country may utilize its resources to meet any eventuality. England and France reached this conclusion too late. A democracy can always take back powers granted. But if a democracy does not grant powers in time there is no power left to take back.

This country has a big job to do. A great majority of our citizens are patriotic and want to help do it. Congress is charged with the responsibility of representing the public. The President has appointed the best minds in the Nation as his advisory council. Congress has backed the President in every request. My only fear is, have we done enough. Can we keep this war away from the Americas? We can if we have the courage to submerge our selfish interest, look realities in the face, and mobilize all our resources to keep war from the Americas. The Naval Affairs Committee tomorrow will recommend the greatest Navy in world history—good for them. Let us make every branch keep step and preserve peace "over here." [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of the RECORD, I think it ought to show a list of foreign possessions on the American Continents. I received this list just recently from the Library of Congress. Denmark has Greenland. Holland has Curacao in the West Indies near Venezuela, and Surinam, commonly known as Dutch Guiana.

France has St. Pierre and Miquelon, south of Newfoundland; Guadeloupe and Martinique, islands between Puerto Rico and South America; and French Guiana in South America.

Great Britain has Canada, a dominion; Newfoundland; Labrador, a dependency of Newfoundland; Bermuda. In the West Indies she has the following eight colonies: the Bahamas, Jamaica, British Leeward Islands, and the British Windward Islands. The British Windward Islands consist of three colonies. There is also British Guiana and British Honduras.

This, indeed, is a rather important array of territory. It is well indeed to have the protection of all the American republics thrown around these possessions so as to prevent transfer to hostile rulers.

We have much to gain through this resolution. It is an extension, a necessary extension as I view it, of the Monroe Doctrine. It will give a warning to grasping dictatorial powers. The resolution, be it remembered, refers primarily to the transfer of title to land already owned by a foreign power. The Monroe Doctrine refers to the acquisition by a foreign power in the first instance. There is, therefore, an essential difference, and it is necessary to have this resolution adopted to round out the purpose underlying the Monroe Doctrine.

I am sure those on the Republican side particularly who voiced any objection would be the first to complain if anything should go amiss in the event we did not adopt this resolution.

Frankly, the Monroe Doctrine did not originate with Monroe—message of December 2, 1823. He simply made it articulate and gave expression to that which had been smoldering in the minds of Washington and others a long time. Jefferson had suggested the Gulf Stream as a dividing line, Europe to remain on one side and the Americas on the other. It is interesting to note that Simon Bolivar, the great South American patriot, had proclaimed a sort of federation of American republics for self-defense against Europe. He, figuratively speaking, desired to put up a sign in the Americas to warn Europe. It was to read: "No trespassing."

The Monroe Doctrine was embraced by all American republics, in the Declaration at Buenos Aires in 1936, and in the Declaration of Lima in 1938.

Then there was the Declaration of Panama. This goes even further than either the Declaration of Buenos Aires or the Declaration of Lima. For at Panama, the American republics made a stronger joint declaration of continental solidarity with all the appropriate spiritual and material means at their disposal. They stated that as neutrals in the current war, they "shall prevent their respective terrestrial, maritime, and aerial territories from being utilized as bases of belligerent operations. They—

> May exclude belligerent submarines from the waters adjacent to their territories or admit them under the condition that they conform to the regulations which each country may prescribe.

But above all, the Declaration of Panama, which is stated to be a direct complement of the Monroe Doctrine, sets up a so-called zone of safety, which includes all the normal maritime routes of communication and trade between the countries of America. As a measure of self-protection the American republics insist that the waters, to a distance of approximately 300 miles from their coasts—

> Shall remain free from the commission of hostile acts or from the undertaking of belligerent activities by the nations engaged in the present war in which the said govenments are not involved.

Significantly, the declaration also contains the following:

> We expect the belligerent nations, and those which in the future may take part in the present war, to observe and respect this declaration which will be made in Panama as a complement of the Monroe Doctrine and of the Declarations of Buenos Aires and Lima.

Thus, the Declaration of Panama extends the Monroe Doctrine a great distance. Thus, the sovereignty of all American nations now is projected about 300 miles east of their Atlantic shores.

It has been stated that the Monroe Doctrine has not been commuted into a statute or resolution. I refer to the resolution adopted by the Senate in 1912, which recited that the United States would not look with unconcern upon the attempt Japan was then making to colonize Lower California at Magdalena Bay. Japan had sought through a private company to acquire a naval base in Magdalena Bay. Without hesitation our Government asserted its position. The resolution is as follows:

> Resolved, That when any harbor or other place in the American Continents is so situated that the occupation thereof for naval or military purposes might threaten the communications or the safety of the United States, the Government of the United States could not see without grave concern the possession of such harbor or other place by any corporation or association which has such a relation to another government, not American, as to give that government practical power of control for naval or military purposes.

On the basis of this precedent, and on the basis of the Declaration of Buenos Aires in 1936, the Declaration of Lima in 1938, and the Declaration of Panama in 1939, we ought, without the slightest hesitation, to adopt this resolution. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I am going to make a motion that all debate be closed.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment. It is now in the hands of the Clerk. I wish to be heard on my amendment.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate close in 10 minutes.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin) there were—ayes 90, noes 30.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. TINKHAM: On page 3, line 4, after the word "interests", insert the following paragraph:
> "(3) That in the wars of the European powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do."

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, if we are to have a proclamation of the Monroe Doctrine, we should have a complete proclamation of it. The Monroe Doctrine consisted of two parts, one as vital as the other. The first part was that European powers were not to interfere with the Western Hemisphere and the other part was that the Western Hemisphere was not to interfere with European powers or the Eastern Hemisphere.

Let me read to you exactly what President Monroe said. It is exactly what is contained in my amendment.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, is it too late to reserve a point of order against the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. Debate has started.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, here are President Monroe's words:

> The citizens of the United States cherish sentiments the most friendly in favor of the liberty and happiness of their fellowmen on that side of the Atlantic. In the wars of the European powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do.
> It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparations for our defense. * * * Our policy in regard to Europe, which was adopted at an early stage of the wars which have so long agitated that quarter of the globe, nevertheless remains the same, which is not to interfere in the internal concerns of any of its powers; to consider the government de facto as the legitimate government for us; to cultivate friendly relations with it and to preserve those relations by a frank, firm, and manly policy, meeting in all instances the just claims of every power, submitting to injuries from none.

It is true that in 1917 we did intervene in a war of the European powers. That intervention was the greatest disaster that ever occurred to our Republic. It should never be allowed to occur again. It was our immunity from devastating wars in Europe until 1917 that gave us our strength and our prosperity.

Mr. Chairman, the words used by President Monroe are the very words used in my amendment. If the Committee passes the resolution without my amendment, only a part of the Monroe Doctrine will be proclaimed.

My amendment is supported also by the following statement of Thomas Jefferson, contained in a letter which he wrote on October 24, 1823:

> Our first and fundamental maxim should be never to entangle ourselves in the broils of Europe; our second, never to suffer Europe to intermeddle with cis-Atlantic affairs.

And by the following statement made by Henry Clay when he was Secretary of State:

> Whilst we do not desire to interfere in Europe, with the political system of the Allied Powers, we should regard as dangerous to our peace and safety any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of our hemisphere.

Also by John Quincy Adams, who, when Secretary of State in 1820, stated:

> The political system of the United States is also essentially extra-European. To stand in firm and cautious independence of all entanglements in the European system has been a cardinal point of their policy under every administration of their Government from the peace of 1783 to this day. If at the original adoption of their system there could have been any doubt of its justice or its wisdom, there can be none at this time. Every year's experience rivets it more deeply in the principles and opinions of the Nation.

Mr. Chairman, if this resolution is passed without my amendment we will not be enunciating the real, fundamental Monroe Doctrine. Certainly, if we assert that European and other powers have no right to intrude or intervene in our affairs, we should accompany that assertion with a declaration that we shall not intrude or intervene in their affairs. I certainly hope the House will do what is sound and in accordance with tradition and adopt my amendment.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield to the honorable Representative from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Is it not true that under the Monroe Doctrine it is just as essential for the United States to stop meddling in the internal affairs and wars of European and other non-American countries as it is for them to stop meddling in the internal affairs, wars, and other problems of the Americas?

Mr. TINKHAM. President Monroe asserted that very policy in the original doctrine.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. If we adopt this resolution, we will only be adopting one side of the Monroe Doctrine, which applies to the Americas, and in doing so we may get into a critical situation because we ignore that side of the Monroe Doctrine which provides that we do not meddle in the internal affairs and wars of non-American foreign nations.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, a similar amendment, as well as other amendments, were offered in the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and we had them all under consideration and gave them careful study. We submitted these amendments to the State Department, and we had officials of the State Department appear before the committee. The State Department recommended that we do not in any way accept these amendments that were submitted. The Committee on Foreign Affairs voted them down as far as our side was concerned.

Yesterday the Senate passed this bill unanimously, by a vote of 76 to 0. There was no opposition. Senator NYE voted for it, Senator CLARK voted for it, and all the Senators present voted for the resolution. I think it would be a mistake at this time to add anything to the resolution that speaks so clearly as to what is intended. I therefore hope the amendment will not prevail.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment reported again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will reread the Tinkham amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk reread the Tinkham amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division, demanded by Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin, there were—ayes 66, noes 104.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the preamble.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1 strike out the first three whereas clauses in the preamble and insert:

"Whereas our traditional policy has been to consider any attempt on the part of non-American powers to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to the peace and safety not only of this country but of the other American republics; and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DUNCAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the Committee, having had under consideration the resolution (H. J. Res. 556) approving nonrecognition of the transfer of any geographic region in the Western Hemisphere from one non-American power to another non-American power, and providing for consultation with other American republics in the event that such transfer should appear likely, pursuant to House Resolution 525, he reported the same back to the House with sundry amendments adopted in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the joint resolution?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I am opposed to the one-sided joint resolution as it is now.

The SPEAKER. Does any gentleman desire to offer a motion to recommit who is unconditionally opposed to the joint resolution?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I am opposed to the joint resolution, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin moves to recommit to the Committee on Foreign Affairs with instructions to report the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 556) back to the House with the following amendment: Page 3, line 4, after the word "interests", add the following paragraph:

"(3) That in the wars of the European powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do."

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin) there were—ayes 37, noes 173.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I object to the vote on the ground a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. (After counting.) Two hundred and fifty-three Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas, 381, nays 8, answered "present" 6, not voting 36, as follows:

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PURCHASE OF STOCK, FEDERAL HOME LOAN BANK BY RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 9958) to authorize the purchase by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of stock of Federal home-loan banks; to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, and for other purposes, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That section 304 of the act entitled 'An act to provide relief in the existing national emergency in banking, and for other purposes", approved March 9, 1933, as amended (U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 12, sec. 51d; Supp. V, title 12, sec. 51d), is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

" 'The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to purchase at par any part of the stock of any Federal home-loan bank owned by the United States, as evidenced by certificates, receipts, or otherwise, in amounts to be determined by the Corporation, with the approval of the Federal Loan Administrator; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized on behalf of the United States to sell such stock to the Corporation. Any such stock so purchased by the Corporation shall be held subject to the same conditions, requirements, rights, and privileges (including all dividend and retirement provisions) as are provided by law for or in connection with the ownership of such stock by the United States.'

"SEC. 2. Section 2 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended (U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 15, sec. 602), is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraphs:

" 'The Corporation is authorized to make payments from time to time to the Secretary of the Treasury in amounts to be determined by the Corporation, with the approval of the Federal Loan Administrator, for the partial retirement of its capital stock at par and in payment of dividends from earnings. The aggregate amount of notes, debentures, bonds, or other such obligations which the Corporation is authorized to issue and have outstanding at any one time under the provisions of law in force on the date this paragraph takes effect shall not be decreased by reason of any retirement of capital stock under this paragraph, and such aggregate amount is hereby increased by an amount sufficient to carry out the provisions of this paragraph and of the second paragraph of section 304 of the act of March 9, 1933, as amended.

" 'The Corporation on or before June 30, 1941, may retire its capital stock and pay dividends under the preceding paragraph of this section, and may purchase stock of the Federal home-loan banks under section 304 of the act of March 9, 1933, as amended, in an aggregate amount of not to exceed $300,000,000 to be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury; but the Corporation, with the approval of the Federal Loan Administrator, shall determine that portion of such aggregate amount which may be used for the retirement of the capital stock of the Corporation, the payment of dividends, and the purchase of such stock of the Federal home-loan banks.'

"SEC. 3. (a) The third paragraph of section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended (U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 15, sec. 605; Supp. V, title 15, sec. 605), is hereby amended by striking out '$350,000,000' and inserting in lieu thereof '$500,000,000.'

"(b) The first sentence of section 3 of the act entitled 'An act to extend the functions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for 2 years, and for other purposes,' approved January 31, 1935, as amended (U. S. C., 1934 ed., Supp. V, title 15, sec. 605m), is hereby amended by striking out 'January 31, 1945' and inserting in lieu thereof 'January 31, 1955.'

"SEC. 4. Section 3 of the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation Act (U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 12, sec. 1020b) is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentences: 'The Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation is authorized to repay on or before June 30, 1941, to the Secretary of the Treasury on behalf of the United States, all amounts in excess of $100,000,000 theretofore subscribed to the capital stock of the corporation. The proceeds of such repayment shall be held in the Treasury of the United States as a fund available for subscription, by the Governor on behalf of the United States with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to the capital of the corporation when, in the judgment of the directors of the Corporation, additional subscriptions to its capital are necessary.'

"SEC. 5. Section 5d of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended (U. S. C., 1934 ed., Supp. V, title 15, sec. 606b), is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraphs:

"'In order to aid the Government of the United States in its national-defense program, the Corporation is authorized—

"'(1) To make loans to, or, when requested by the Federal Loan Administrator with the approval of the President, purchase the capital stock of, any corporation (a) for the purpose of producing, acquiring, and carrying stategic and critical materials as defined by the President, and (b) for plant construction, expansion and equipment, and working capital, to be used by the corporation in the manufacture of equipment and supplies necessary to the national defense, on such terms and conditions and with such maturities as the Corporation may determine; and

"'(2) When requested by the Federal Loan Administrator, with the approval of the President, to create or to organize a corporation or corporations, with power (a) to produce, acquire, and carry strategic and critical materials as defined by the President, (b) to purchase and lease land, to purchase, lease, build, and expand plants, and to purchase and produce equipment, supplies, and machinery, for the manufacture of arms, ammunition, and implements of war, (c) to lease such plants to private corporations to engage in such manufacture, and (d) if the President finds that it is necessary for a Government agency to engage in such manufacture, to engage in such manufacture itself. The Corporation may make loans to, or purchase the capital stock of, any such corporation for any purpose within the powers of the Corporation as above set forth related to the national-defense program, on such terms and conditions as the Corporation may determine.

"'Any corporation created or organized by the Corporation under the preceding paragraph is also authorized, with the approval of the President, to make payments against the purchase price to be paid for strategic and critical materials in advance of the delivery of such materials. Whenever practicable, the Corporation may require the payments so made to be used for purchases of raw or manufactured agricultural commodities to be exported from the United States.'

"SEC. 6. That (a) section 1 of the act approved January 26, 1937 (U. S. C., 1934 ed., Supp. IV, title 15 sec. 613c), as amended, is hereby amended by striking out 'June 30, 1941' and inserting in lieu thereof 'January 22, 1947'; (b) the first sentence of section 4 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act (U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 15, sec. 604), as amended, and the first sentence of section 14 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act (U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 15, sec. 614), as amended, are hereby amended by striking out the word 'ten' and inserting in lieu thereof the word 'fifteen'; (c) the second paragraph of section 5 (d) of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act (U. S. C., 1934 ed., Supp. IV, title 15, sec. 606b), as amended, is hereby amended by striking out 'June 30, 1939' wherever it appears therein and inserting in lieu thereof 'January 22, 1947'."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Will the gentleman tell us what this amendment does?

Mr. STEAGALL. The Senate amendment does not make any substantial change in the legislation except that it authorizes the lease of land in connection with the defense program as well as holding and acquiring material and equipment for war purposes, and also the use of the word "produce." In other words, it authorizes the production along with the acquiring and holding of materials of defense.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. What was the fate of the so-called Miller amendment?

Mr. STEAGALL. The Miller amendment is intact in the amendment that I have just indicated.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Permitting to lease land as well as buy it?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes; and permitting production as well as acquiring and holding.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. This is a unanimous vote of the committee to accept this amendment?

Mr. STEAGALL. There is no objection on the part of the minority.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 19, 1940

(Legislative day of Tuesday, May 28, 1940)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Barney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Spirit of the living God, breathe upon us with Thy quickening power that we may feel a renewed sense of privilege as we enter upon the duties of another day. Make us conscious of our ability to meet its great demands because of Thine indwelling in hearts now humbly waiting to enshrine the Infinite God.

Help us to realize as ne'er before the high demands of public service amid the tragedies that have befallen men and nations. May we abhor all lesser standards of the right, and, with a robust courage, with poise and self-possession, may we choose the higher ways of life, where mercy and truth, righteousness, and peace shall one day meet and dwell together to the establishment of God's glory among men. We ask it in the name of Jesus Christ, our Lord and Saviour. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. BARKLEY, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day of Tuesday, June 18, 1940, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

NOTIFICATION TO PRESIDENT OF CONFIRMATION OF JUDICIAL NOMINATIONS IN FLORIDA

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, on last Saturday the nomination of Mr. Curtis L. Waller to be Federal judge in the State of Florida was confirmed, and the nomination of Mr. Jordan B. Royall to be United States marshal for the northern district of Florida was confirmed. As in executive session, I ask unanimous consent that the President be notified of the confirmation of those nominations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. The nominations, as I understand, have been confirmed?

Mr. BARKLEY. They were confirmed on Saturday last.

Mr. McNARY. And the request is now that the President be notified?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the President will be notified of the confirmation of the nominations referred to.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] is absent on official duties.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Ninety-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

CORRECTION

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, during the course of the debate yesterday, on page 8506 of the RECORD, when the senior Senator from Maryland was speaking, the RECORD reads:

> What have we heard in the Senate for the past 4 or 5 weeks? "Stop Hitler! This country is faced with a great emergency. We must sell planes."

In other words, I was not saying "Stop Hitler" or "We must sell planes," or "We are faced with a great emergency." I was quoting some of the debate which has taken place here during the past 4 or 5 weeks.

As reported in this morning's Baltimore Sun, however, I am put in this position:

> When his 5-percent amendment went down to defeat, Senator TYDINGS literally screamed. With a high-pitched blast he shouted, in news-vendor fashion, "Stop Hitler now," "Fill the skies with clouds of planes," "A navy second to none."

[Laughter.]

Mr. President, I did use very much vehemence in imitating some of the impassioned speeches made on the floor, as the RECORD shows, in order to show the emergency which certain Senators thought they faced, and which I agree we do face; but at no time did I indulge in the remarks attributed to me in the manner set forth in the Sun. I take this opportunity to correct the record, so that the future historian will get the truth about this particular happening.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Memorializing the Congress of the United States to place the United States in an immediate state of preparedness by establishing universal military training of the young men of the Nation

Be it resolved, That this Legislature of the State of Louisiana urge the Congress of the United States—

To place upon the statute books of the United States of America a law to make immediately effective universal military training of the young men of the Nation in order that our liberty and our freedom from foreign domination may be secured;

To cause this provision of law to take effect this summer in order that the first class to be called gain instruction at the earliest possible moment;

To limit the period of instruction for each class to 6 months in order that the largest number of classes possible may receive training prior to their probable need, and to place the greatest number in a state of readiness at the smallest cost to the taxpayers of this country; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this concurrent resolution be forwarded immediately to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, to the Louisiana senatorial and congressional representatives in Washington, and to the press.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a telegram in the nature of a petition, signed by Mrs. Guy Hayler, president, National Legion Mothers of America (western headquarters), San Francisco, Calif., praying that the United States may keep out of the present European conflict and that no American boys be sent to fight on foreign soil, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I present the petition of Neuman-Wenzel Post, No. 73, American Legion, of Sturgis, Mich., which is signed by 841 citizens of that vicinity. I ask that the petition may be appropriately referred, and the body thereof printed in the RECORD without the signatures attached.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD (without the signatures attached), as follows:

AMERICAN LEGION,
NEUMAN-WENZEL POST, No. 73,
Sturgis, Mich., June 17, 1940.

The Honorable ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Neuman-Wenzel Post, No. 73, of the American Legion, and the 841 undersigned citizens, realizing the serious situations confronting our Nation, believe that:

1. The use of our warships to convey help and supplies to the Allies is nothing short of an act of war. This and all activities by citizens or Government that would lead us into war, or nearer thereto, must be stopped.

2. That Congress should remain in session all during the present crisis to preserve our American system of government.

3. That all agencies, of whatever nature, either individuals or groups, tending to promote dissatisfaction with our American form of Government must be crushed.

We urge your untiring assistance in every way possible to the accomplishment of the above beliefs.

Courteously,

[Signed by the commander of the post, and 841 other citizens.]

THE NATIONAL DEFENSE—RESOLUTION OF BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS, NEWPORT, KY.

Mr. BARKLEY presented a resolution of the Board of Commissioners of the City of Newport, Ky., which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution proffering to the United States of America any and all municipal properties and facilities of and in the city of Newport, Ky., to further the defense and rearmament plan instituted and adopted by said Federal Government

Whereas it is the sense of the officers, officials, and employees of the city of Newport, Ky., and of the residents and inhabitants of said municipality, that full and complete cooperation and accord be tendered those responsible for our national defense and rearmament; and

Whereas it is deemed that an international and national emergency exists which threatens the homes and firesides of every American citizen, as well as the democratic American ideals brought into being, fostered, and maintained by our forefathers: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Board of Commissioners of the City of Newport, Ky.:

SECTION 1. That any and all properties and facilities of and in the city of Newport, Ky., be, and they are hereby unreservedly proffered and tendered to the United States of America for such use or uses as may be consistent with the national defense and rearmament plan instituted and adopted by our said Federal Government.

SEC. 2. That copies of this resolution be forthwith mailed by the city clerk of the city of Newport, Ky., to the United States Senators from Kentucky, Hon. ALBEN W. BARKLEY and Hon. A. B. CHANDLER, and to the Congressman from the Fifth Congressional District, Hon. BRENT SPENCE, at Washington, D. C.

SEC. 3. That this resolution shall take effect and be in force from the earliest date provided by law and from and after the publication hereof.

EARL DIETZ, Mayor pro tempore.

COMPULSORY MILITARY TRAINING—TELEGRAM FROM NATIONAL GUARD OFFICERS ASSOCIATION, JACKSON, MISS.

Mr. BILBO presented a telegram from the National Guard Officers Association, Jackson, Miss., which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JACKSON, MISS., June 16, 1940.

Senator THEODORE G. BILBO,
Washington, D. C.:

The National Guard Association of Mississippi passed the following resolution unanimously: This date be it resolved by the National Guard Association of the State of Mississippi in convention assembled that in order to keep up with modern developments in military science it is necessary that a form of adequate compulsory military training for all able-bodied male citizens of the United States should immediately be established and put into effect. Your cooperation is required.

THE NATIONAL GUARD OFFICERS ASSOCIATION,
MAJ. JOHN PATTON, Secretary.

RESOLUTION OF AGRICULTURAL POLICY AND PLANNING COMMITTEE OF MISSISSIPPI

Mr. BILBO presented a resolution of the Agricultural Policy and Planning Committee of the State of Mississippi, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD with the signatures attached thereto, as follows:

Whereas the Government of the United States of America has manifested not merely a willingness and desire to be of benefit to the farmers of the land, but has put forth more time and effort and has expended more funds in seeking to put the agricultural interests of this country on a higher and more permanent basis than has ever occurred in our history; and

Whereas our Government, due to world-wide conditions, is faced with problems and responsibilities, perhaps greater than at any other time in its history; and

Whereas, even as the farmers of the country appreciate the steps of the Government in their behalf, they also realize that if they do not continue to play their part in the economic life of the country, all efforts for its preservation must fail, and now, as at all other times, it is their intention to meet and discharge every duty cast upon them by national need or emergency: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Agricultural Policy and Planning Committee of the State of Mississippi, in State-wide meeting assembled, at Jackson, Miss., on this June 11, 1940, as follows:

First. That we, representing the farmers of the State of Mississippi, for ourselves and for all those we represent, do hereby pledge to the President of the United States, his Cabinet, to the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives, and all others in official position throughout our land, our earnest and wholehearted cooperation in those policies, measures, and plans which may be enacted or put into effect in the present emergency.

Second. Not only loyally to undertake to carry out those things which may actually so be required of us, we further declare it to be our purpose, at all times, as good citizens, to be alert against those things which would directly or indirectly interfere with the safety and welfare of our Government, but without passion, prejudice, or hysteria.

The resolution was sponsored by Dr. Joe E. Frazer and was unanimously adopted.

The names of members of the committee present appear on the resolution and are listed below.

Frank D. Barlow, Dr. Joe E. Frazer, P. R. Williams, H. C. Carter, Aubrey Sigrest, S. W. Pierce, C. A. Oakley, J. A. Randle, Mrs. R. E. Wilkerson, Mrs. A. L. Love, Mrs. Mittie Lou Perkins, Mrs. Elma S. Wade.

RESOLUTION OF HARRY HARVEY POST, NO. 14, AMERICAN LEGION, M'COMB CITY, MISS.

Mr. BILBO presented a resolution of Harry Harvey Post, No. 14, American Legion, of McComb City, Miss., which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution reaffirming the loyalty of Harry Harvey Post, No. 14, of the American Legion, McComb City, Pike County, Miss., to the ideals of democratic government, and reaffirming our loyalty to our former Allies, pledging our loyalty to their cause, and urging immediate aid to them by our Government

Whereas one of the fundamental purposes of the American Legion is to perpetuate and foster the democratic ideals of government that have been maintained by the United States of America during the entire period of its existence, for the promotion of which many sacrifices have been made; and

Whereas in 1917 and 1918 our Government joined with England, France, and other allied governments in the World War for the purpose of attempting to perpetuate these democratic ideals of government; and

Whereas the same forces which menaced the people of the world in the years 1914 to 1918 are again threatening to destroy all decent principles of government; and

Whereas the Governments and citizens of England and France are now engaged in a life-and-death struggle to preserve civilization and democratic forms of government, and to preserve civil liberties; and

Whereas if our former Allies are successful, their efforts will greatly benefit the people of this Government, but if they fail it will be necessary ultimately for us to fight the same forces that now oppose them, and without their aid; and

Whereas it is the opinion of the members of this post that every possible aid should immediately be rendered the Governments of France and E...land by the Government of the United States and its people: Now, therefore be it

Resolved, By Harry Harvey Post, No. 14, of the American Legion, of McComb City, Pike County, Miss.:

SECTION 1. That this post of the American Legion does now definitely reaffirm its loyalty to the democratic ideals of our form of government, and does reaffirm its belief in and loyalty to the principles which our former Allies are now so courageously defending, and we do hereby condemn the efforts now being made by Germany and Italy to destroy civilization, civil liberties, and decency, and we do condemn not only the objectives of Germany and Italy but also the barbaric methods by which they are attempting to obtain victory.

SEC. 2. That the President and Congress of the United States are hereby urged to dedicate all available material resources to the immediate aid of England and France, and that food, metals, supplies, ammunition, airplanes, and other military mechanisms and materials be forthwith furnished them.

SEC. 3. That we pledge our cooperation to the Government of the United States in all efforts undertaken in this behalf, and we endorse the position of the President that we give France and England first call upon every material thing we can produce, and we further urge that every weapon, not indispensable for the preservation of law and order within our own boundaries, and not necessary for our immediate defense, be made available to them, and that other aid, such as extending credit, furnishing food, medical supplies, and money be forthwith given.

SEC. 4. We do especially condemn all un-American activities, forms of propaganda, nazi-ism, fascism, communism, and all other "isms" except Americanism, and we do hereby tender our services to crush and stamp out all un-American practices, including extermination of the so-called "fifth column."

SEC. 5. That this resolution be published as an expression of this post, and in order to sustain the spirit of all loyal Americans, and so that all disloyal citizens and aliens may be solemnly warned that their subversive activities shall not be tolerated.

RESOLUTION OF KIWANIS CLUB, GREENWOOD, MISS.

Mr. BILBO presented a resolution of the Kiwanis Club, of Greenwood, Miss., which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas this club, made up of representatives of the leading citizens in all walks of life within this community, feeling the great duty that rests upon us at this time to exemplify our love for the preservation of freedom and democracy in the world; and

Whereas the time has come for every true citizen of this Government to evidence by his action his desire to give 100-percent support with his personal and financial ability to every act and principle of our Government for the preservation of democracy and freedom in the world; and

Whereas we realize that the mongers of destruction abroad in the world are desirous of destroying the best in our civilization: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That this club hereby express condemnation for those countries and the leaders thereof who are now bringing consternation and suffering to the helpless countries of Europe, that we stamp as shameful and cowardly the totalitarian countries engaged in the conquest of hatred and destruction upon the weak and helpless; be it further

Resolved, That we express our full sympathy and approval of the action of Congress of the United States for the support now given to the democracies of Europe and hereby request that the swiftest and fullest support be given that this Government is capable of furnishing without regard for cost or sacrifice: Be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to Mississippi's Senators and the Congressman from this district.

By Mr. ANDREWS:

S. 4160. A bill authorizing the transfer of William Howard Christian to the retired list of the Navy; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. MEAD:

S. J. Res. 281. Joint resolution to determine the nature and effect of economic conditions, statutory provisions, or other restrictions tending to produce unfair or inequitable discrimination on the basis of age in obtaining and retaining employment in public service and private industry, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

FEDERAL ELECTIONS BILL

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I am about to introduce a bill as a result of a study made for several months by a committee of the American Bar Association. It relates to Federal elections. This work should not be construed as having met with the approval of the American Bar Association, for the committee has not as yet reported, but the chairman of the committee, Mr. Arthur J. Freund, of St. Louis, Mo., prepared a statement explaining the proposed bill, and also the Federal elections law. I ask unanimous consent that I may introduce the bill for proper reference, and that the bill, with the accompanying statement, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 4157) to enforce the rights of citizens of the United States in the nomination and election of Senators, Representatives, Electors, the President, and Vice President of the United States, and in any election to amend the Constitution of the United States, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the Federal Elections Act.

SEC. 2. The term "election" as used in this act shall mean—

(a) any primary election, or nominating election, or general election whereby persons are selected, nominated, or elected by and under the authority of the Constitution and the laws of the United States, or by and under the authority of the Constitution or the laws of any State or Territory for the nomination or election of any United States Senator, Representative to the Congress of the United States, Elector of the President or the Vice President of the United States, or the President of the United States, or the Vice President of the United States;

(b) Any election held by and under the authority of the Constitution and laws of the United States, or by and under the authority of the Constitution or laws of any State to vote upon any amendment to the Constitution of the United States

The term "voter" as used in this act shall mean any person lawfully entitled by and under the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the United States or by and under the constitution or the laws of any State or Territory to participate in and vote at any election.

The term "officer of election" as used in this act shall mean any judge, clerk, canvasser, commissioner, or other person whose duty it is or shall be to receive, count, canvass, certify, register, supervise, or report, or give effect to the vote of any voter at any election, or the registration or qualification of any voter for any election.

SEC. 3. It shall be unlawful for any officer of election—

(a) Knowingly, willfully, or fraudulently to refuse or omit to receive, count, certify, register, report, or give effect to the lawful vote of any voter; or

(b) Knowingly, willfully, or fraudulently to give or attempt to give effect to any false or fraudulent vote, or to give or make, or attempt to give or make, any false count, certificate, document, report, or other false evidence in relation to any election.

SEC. 4. It shall be unlawful for any person—

(a) By force, bribery, reward, menace, threat, intimidation, trick, or knowingly, willfully, or fraudulently to hinder, delay, prevent, or obstruct any voter from doing any lawful act required to be done to qualify him to vote or from lawfully voting at any election; or

(b) By any such means or knowingly, willfully, or fraudulently advise, aid or abet, maintain, or procure, or attempt to maintain or to procure the placing, registration, or enrollment of any false, fraudulent, unlawful, or fictitious name or names upon the election rolls, poll books, books or documents of registration or election, or any other records of registration or election used or intended to be used at any election by any officer of election as a list or designation of lawfully qualified voters; or

(c) By any such means or knowingly, willfully, or fraudulently to compel or induce, or attempt to compel or induce any officer of election to receive the vote at any election of any person not lawfully entitled to vote at such election; or

(d) By any such means or knowingly, willfully, or fraudulently to counsel, advise, induce, or attempt to induce any officer of election to give or make any false count, certificate, document, report, or other false evidence in relation thereto, or to refuse or neglect to comply with his duties prescribed by law at any election, or to refuse the vote of any person lawfully entitled to vote in such election, or to violate any law regulating such election; or

(e) By any such means or knowingly, willfully, or fraudulently to obstruct, interfere with, delay, or hinder in any manner any officer of election in the lawful discharge of his duties at any election.

SEC. 5. It shall be unlawful for any person, at any election, falsely to impersonate a voter or other person, and vote, or attempt to vote, or offer to vote in or upon any name not his own, or to vote, or attempt to vote, or offer to vote, in or upon the name of any other person living or dead, or in or upon any assumed or fictitious name; or knowingly, willfully, or fraudulently to vote or attempt to vote or offer to vote more than once at the same election, except as authorized by law, or knowingly, willfully, or fraudulently to vote, or attempt to vote, or offer to vote in an election or at a place where he is not lawfully entitled to vote.

SEC. 6. If two or more persons enter into an agreement, confederation, or conspiracy to violate any of the foregoing provisions of this act, and do any overt act toward carrying out such unlawful agreement, confederation, or conspiracy, such person or persons shall be punished in the manner as hereinafter provided by this act.

SEC. 7. The sole purpose of this act is to secure to the citizens of the United States the honest and lawful conduct of elections which affect the selection of United States Senators, Representatives to the Congress of the United States, United States Presidential and Vice-Presidential electors, the President and Vice President of the United States, and the adoption or rejection of proposed amendments to the Constitution of the United States. None of the provisions of this act shall be deemed or construed to apply to elections other than such elections, or to any acts or conduct of election officials or other persons which do not affect the nomination, selection, or election of any United States Senator, Representative to the Congress of the United States, United States Presidential or Vice-Presidential electors, or the President or Vice President of the United States, or the adoption or rejection of any amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

SEC. 8. Any person committing any offense defined in this act shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both.

SEC. 9. If any provision of this act, or the application of any such provision to any person or circumstance, shall be held invalid, the remainder of this act, or the application of such provision to persons or circumstances other than those as to which it is held invalid, shall not be affected thereby.

The statement presented by Mr. HATCH in connection with the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL ELECTIONS LAW

In the early part of 1939 a committee on Federal election laws was appointed by the Criminal Law Council of the American Bar Association. The committee consisted of Henry W. Toll, of Denver, Colo.; George R. Jeffrey, of Indianapolis, Ind.; Hon. John B. Sanborn, of St. Paul, Minn., judge of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit; and Arthur J. Freund, of St. Louis, Mo., chairman. This committee was assisted by Hon. Albert L. Reeves and Hon. Merrill E. Otis, judges of the United States District Court for the Western District of Missouri.

It was noted that under the present state of the Federal law there could be a national conspiracy formed and carried out to fraudulently elect the President and Vice President of the United States without the violation of any Federal law. Furthermore, there is no Federal law to reach fraud and corruption in the nomination or selection of United States Senators and Representatives for Congress. The present Federal law pertaining to the election of these officers is wholly deficient for the reason that there is no direct legislation dealing with fraudulent practices at any election.

The committee was charged with the duty of preparing a proposed bill to insure to United States citizens, as far as possible, that elections in which national officers or national questions were to be voted upon should be honestly conducted.

The committee has prepared a proposed bill styled the "Federal Elections Act" to remedy existing defects in the law pertaining to the nomination and election of Federal officers, by denouncing as Federal offenses dishonest acts which affect the vote upon Federal officers, including the President and Vice President of the United States, and upon national questions upon which there may be a popular election.

This proposed Federal elections law is the result of much thought and careful study. It has received the approval of all of the members of the committee and of Judge Reeves and of Judge Otis, as well as many other members of the bench and bar.

It is not a matter of common knowledge, even among members of the bar, that the only Federal law on the subject of election frauds, except the narrow provisions of the Corrupt Practices Act (2 U. S. C. A., par. 241–254) and the Hatch Act (U. S. C., Current Service, 1939, No. 10, pp. 1242–1244), is section 19 of the Criminal Code (18 U. S. C. A., par. 51), a conspiracy section, which, among other things, makes it a Federal offense if two or more persons conspire to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen in the free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States. It was under this section that the Kansas City prosecutions for fraudulent practices at the 1936 general election were based (Walker v. United States, 93 F. (2d) 383, and other opinions in the same volume). It was held in the Walker case that a conspiracy to fraudulently select presidential electors at an election does not come within the purview of the present Federal statutes. This was a direct holding to the effect that there is no Federal law which denounces as a crime fraudulent practices or criminal conspiracies in the election of a President or Vice President of the United States. Furthermore, there is no Federal law which makes it a Federal offense to commit vote frauds or to carry on fraudulent conspiracies at primary elections wherein nominees for the offices of United States Senators and Members of Congress are nominated at general primary elections.

The conspiracy section in the present Federal law is section 19 of the Criminal Code (sec. 5508, R. S., 18 U. S. C. A., par. 51), which reads as follows:

"If two or more persons conspire to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen in the free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States, or because of his having so exercised the same, or if two or more persons go in disguise on the highway, or on the premises of another, with intent to prevent or hinder his free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege so secured, they shall be fined not more than $5,000 and imprisoned not more than 10 years, and shall, moreover, be thereafter ineligible to any office or place of honor, profit, or trust created by the Constitution or laws of the United States."

It will be seen from the above section that it does not specifically apply to election offenses; it does not denounce as a crime the impersonation of voters, multiple voting, bribery or intimidation of voters, or the numerous other devices and practices common to vote stealing. Further, and what is of utmost importance, it does not define as an offense a conspiracy to fraudulently affect the vote for the President or Vice President of the United States. It was held in the Walker Case, supra (93 F. (2d) at 388, locl cit.), that inasmuch as the Federal Constitution does not provide that the selection of electors shall be by popular vote, or that electors shall be voted for upon a general ticket, or that the majority of those who exercise the elective franchise can alone choose the electors, a conspiracy to fraudulently select Presidential electors at an election does not come within the purview of the present Federal statute. It was pointed out in that opinion that the Federal Constitution leaves it to the State legislature to define the methods of effecting the object, and that as an elector is a State officer the Federal act referred to does not pertain to the office of an elector for the President or Vice President of the United States. There seems to be no doubt that the Federal Government has this right, if it chooses to exercise it, but under the present state of the law there could be a national conspiracy formed and successfully carried out to fraudulently elect the President and Vice President of the United States without the violation of any Federal law.

HISTORY OF PRIOR LEGISLATION

On May 31, 1870, Congress passed a law containing a series of sections, the whole act being entitled "An act to enforce the right of citizens of the United States to vote in the several cities of this Union, and for other purposes" (16 Stat. L. 140–146). Section 6 of this act included what, with some alterations, is now section 19 of the Criminal Code. Among the substantive acts which were prohibited and made offenses were those of interfering with any election officer, or inducing any such officer, whose duty it was to ascertain, announce, or declare the result or to make any certificate, document, or evidence relative thereto, to violate his duty (sec. 19). It was made an offense for any such election officer to neglect or to refuse to perform any of his duties, or to do any unauthorized act with intent to "affect such election or the result thereof"; or to "fraudulently make any false certificate of the result of such election"; or to withhold, conceal, or destroy any required certificate pertaining to such election; or to neglect or refuse to make a return the same as required by law; or to omit to do any required duty; or to counsel, procure, etc., the same to be done (sec. 22). It was also made an offense to impersonate and vote for any person living, dead, or fictitious, to vote more than once, to vote without lawful right, to bribe a voter, etc. (sec. 19).

There were numerous other provisions dealing with the elective franchise, fraudulent registration, obstructing execution of process, conspiracy to deprive persons of the equal protection of the laws, conspiracy to prevent the support of any candidate, provisions relative to supervisors of elections, etc.

July 14, 1870, and more extensively later, on June 10, 1872, Congress passed laws making provisions for the supervision of elections by supervisors appointed by the Federal courts (16 Stat. at L. 254–255; 17 Stat. at L. 347–349).

Section 6, the present section 19 of the Criminal Code, remained in its original form until the revision of 1874, when the laws of the United States were revised and codified. In the revision, it became section 5508, Revised Statutes.

However, on February 8, 1894, Congress repealed all of the portions of the May 31, 1870, act which made offenses the various substantive acts in connection with the election franchise, and also repealed the laws providing for Federal supervisors of elections (28 Stat. at L. 36).

The history of this legislation and kindred legislation is traced in the opinions in United States v. Gradwell (243 U. S. 476); United States v. Bathgate (246 U. S. 220); and United States v. Mosley (238 U. S. 383).

THE PROPOSED LEGISLATION DOES NOT CHANGE THE LAW OF ANY STATE

It is, of course, well recognized that a great deal of fraud in elections having to do with Federal officers is committed at primary elections, and the importance of primary elections in the selection of proper officials needs no emphasis. It is the opinion of the committee that Federal election laws should properly have to do not only with the general election of Federal officers, but with the primary election for such officers.

The proposed legislation changes no present State law; it adds no new duty or additional burden upon election officials. It merely provides that it shall be a Federal offense if such elections are dishonestly conducted where the vote upon a national officer or national question is affected.

SUBSTANCE OF THE PROPOSED LEGISLATION

The bill provides in substance that an election shall be defined to mean any primary or general election held under the laws of any State or Territory or under the laws of the United States for the nomination or election of any Representative or Senator, any elector of or direct vote for the President or Vice President. It is made an offense for any election official to fraudulently miscount or tabulate the result of any such election. It is further made an offense for any person by force, bribery, threat, or any such other means to prevent or obstruct a voter from voting or from qualifying him to vote; to fraudulently pad the election rolls to be used at a Federal election; or to fraudulently induce an election official to receive an illegal vote or to refuse a legal one.

It is also made an offense for any person to willfully or fraudulently impersonate a voter or to vote in any fictitious name or to vote more than once or to vote in an election or at a place where he is not entitled to vote. A conspiracy of two or more persons to violate the act is further denounced as an offense.

The act specifically provides that its sole purpose is to secure to the citizens of the United States the honest and lawful conduct of elections which affect the selection of United States Senators, Representatives to the Congress of the United States, United States Presidential and Vice Presidential electors, the President and Vice President of the United States, and the adoption or rejection of proposed amendments to the Constitution of the United States. It is provided that none of the provisions of the act shall be deemed or construed to apply to elections other than such elections, or to any acts or conduct of election officials or other persons which do not affect the nomination, selection, or election of any United States Senator, Representative to the Congress of the United States, United States Presidential or Vice Presidential elector, or the President or Vice President of the United States, or the adoption or rejection of any amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The punishment provided is a fine of not more than $5,000 or imprisonment for not more than 10 years, or both.

IMPORTANCE OF THE PROPOSED LEGISLATION

It is of the highest importance to note that the Federal Government in no way changes the election laws of any State or any subdivision thereof. It is the opinion of all right-thinking persons that such laws, however, should be honestly administered. The bill proposes that this be done so far as it is within the powers of the Federal Government to make it so.

Upon the proposed draft of the Federal Elections Act, Judge Reeves writes:

"It is my opinion that your bill quite admirably covers all of the matters desired to be included in a good election law. This bill should be passed by the Congress."

Judge Otis likewise gives his opinion as follows:

"I have carefully considered the proposed bill prepared by your committee * * * to enforce the rights of citizens of the United States in the nomination and election of Senators, Representatives, and Presidential electors. I am decidedly in favor of the adoption of this bill as law. The Federal judges in Kansas City have had, perhaps, more intimate experience with attempts to defeat the rights of citizens in elections than have any other judges in the country. The present laws are certainly inadequate to protect the rights of citizens. Under the present laws great things have been accomplished here in Kansas City, but the difficulties have been apparent and the narrow field in which it is possible for the Department of Justice to operate has been especially apparent. It is difficult to conceive of any reason why there should not be jurisdiction in the Federal courts to protect the rights of all citizens in all elections in which Federal officials are nominated or chosen for public office."

Judge Reeves and Judge Otis are the judges who presided at the Kansas City election fraud conspiracy cases, and they are wholly and acutely aware of the present Federal law on the subject of election frauds and its deficiencies.

Judge John B. Sanborn, of the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, wrote the major opinions in the Kansas City cases. He is a member of the committee which drafted the proposed legislation, and he actively assisted in the preparation of the bill.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE PROPOSED LEGISLATION

The committee which prepared this bill is of the opinion that the Congress has the constitutional right to enact legislation having to do with the primary election of Representatives for Congress and United States Senators. It may be thought by some that in view of the decision in Newberry v. United States (256 U. S. 232), there is no constitutional authority for Federal legislation having to do with primary elections. But, in the Newberry case the dissenting opinions written by Chief Justice White and Mr. Justice Pitney appear to be not only persuasive but conclusive arguments that the election process commences at the time a candidate first begins to seek nomination and continues until the votes in the general election have been cast and counted. The basis of the system of control provided in this proposed bill rests fundamentally upon its relation to elections at which United States Senators and Representatives are chosen. It has repeatedly been held that in order to preserve the integrity of such elections the Congress may assert almost any degree of control which it finds necessary to prevent election frauds and corruption.

It is the opinion of the committee that the United States Supreme Court would sustain the proposed act as constitutional as it affects primary and general elections, and elections affecting the President and Vice President and national questions.

INADEQUACY OF THE PRESENT LAW

A mere reading of the present conspiracy section (section 19) demonstrates its present inadequacy to fulfill the objects sought to be reached by the proposed bill. Indictments based upon the same section have been drawn where homesteaders were interfered with in their rights, Buchanan v. United States (233 Fed. 257), where there was a conspiracy to deprive a postmaster of his right to enjoy his office, McDonald v. United States (9 Fed. (2d) 506); where conspirators attacked a rancher on public land scattering and killing sheep, Janes v. United States (6 Fed. (2d) 545), and where there was an alleged conspiracy to injure, oppress, and threaten a citizen in the free exercise of his right to speak and publish his views in a newspaper, Powe v. United States (109 F (2d) 147). A statute so general in its terms is quite inadequate to cover our present situation regarding fraudulent elections.

It seems quite obvious that if vote stealing at Federal elections is to become widespread, or if such practices are to become national in scope, the last hope of a democracy has failed.

The proposed bill was approved by the Criminal Law Council of the American Bar Association at its meeting in Chicago in January of this year. The matter was then presented, in the general form of a resolution approving the principle for which the bill stands, to the house of delegates of the association. This resolution was debated upon the floor of the house of delegates of the association and, by a vote of 57 to 50, the resolution was sent back to the criminal law section of the association for further study. It cannot be said that the proposed bill has the sanction or approval of the American Bar Association, although it is likely that the matter will be again presented to the house of delegates of the association at its annual meeting in Philadelphia in September of this year.

No more important subject confronts the American people in the conduct of its internal affairs than the sanctity of its elections. It is believed that the proposed bill, when enacted into law, will be a progressive and effective forward step in assuring to the people of the United States that Federal elections will be honestly conducted.

A NEW DEAL GESTAPO?

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I desire at this time to read a letter which I have mailed to Stephen Early, the Secretary to the President, which sets forth a reprehensible incident authorized by the President, which took place 4 years ago at the time of the last Republican National Convention in Cleveland, and one which I believe should see the light of day. Therefore I read this letter:

JUNE 19, 1940.

Hon. STEPHEN EARLY,
Secretary to the President, the White House.

DEAR MR. EARLY: There has recently been placed in my hands a signed statement by one who served in an official capacity as confidential agent in the Department of the Interior, which states that at the time of the last Republican National Convention, six official investigators of the Department of Interior, acting under orders of the White House, made a secret visit to the convention at Cleveland to do undercover work. I am advised that among these official investigators were Messrs. Nelson D. Zimmerman, George F. Hurley, Eric G. Peterson, and Richard J. McCormick.

It is unfortunate that in America the party in power should make use of the taxpayers' money for such a purpose and in view of the approaching convention and the possibility of a repetition of these tactics, I am writing to advise that, for the first time in history, the events of the Republican National Convention will be televised, the platform made public, and in addition to this, as a delegate to the convention, I will be glad, in order to save the White House from repeating this incident with public funds, to visit the White House after the convention is over and report to you or to the President what took place

I assure you that, after the convention is over, you will have learned that the Republican Party adopted a platform providing for real security for the rank and file of our citizens and nominated for the Presidency one who will be elected in November and who, as President, will turn us back from the road to war and on the road to the American way of life. Equally as important, he will turn back to the people's representatives in Congress, those powers which, under our American form of government, belong to the people and not to any one man.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES W. TOBEY.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1827) to allow moving expenses to employees in the Railway Mail Service.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9958) to authorize the purchase by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of stock of Federal home-loan banks; to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 10104. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1940, and June 30, 1941, and for other purposes; and

H. J. Res. 556. Joint resolution approving nonrecognition of the transfer of any geographic region in the Western Hemisphere from one non-American power to another non-American power, and providing for consultation with other American republics in the event that such transfer should appear likely.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the President pro tempore:

H. R. 9117. An act to eliminate the tax on brandy and wine spirits used in the fortification of wine, to increase the tax on wine, to compensate for the loss of revenue occasioned by the elimination of the tax on brandy and wine spirits used in the fortification of wine, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 9909. An act to amend sections 2803 (c) and 2903 of the Internal Revenue Code.

REVENUE BILL OF 1940

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10039) to provide for the expenses of national preparedness by raising revenue and issuing bonds, to provide a method for paying for such bonds, and for other purposes.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, as I understand the parliamentary situation, the pending question is the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] as a substitute for the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance with respect to the reduction of Government expenditures.

When the session was closing last evening I had objected to the original amendment reported by the committee, and to the substitutes offered by the Senator from Maryland, on the ground that in each instance these amendments gave no assurance whatsoever as to where the proposed reductions would be made; that if adopted they would amount to a surrender of the authority of the legislative body, and Congress would have no supervisory power whatever over the curtailment. I therefore hastily drafted upon the desk a substitute which I asked the Senator from Maryland to accept in lieu of the amendment he had offered. I could not offer it, as I understood, from the parliamentary point of view, as an amendment to his amendment, because it would be an amendment in the third degree. I therefore ask the Senator from Maryland if he is willing to withdraw his amendment and allow this one to be substituted for it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, what would happen in the event the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming should be voted down? Would my amendment still be in order?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. If the Senator were to withdraw his amendment I think it would be in order; but that is a question for the Chair to decide.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator should withdraw the amendment, it would be in order for him to reoffer it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then I will withdraw it temporarily, and give the Senator from Wyoming a chance to offer his amendment.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I think the matter has been sufficiently discussed. I offer the amendment which I now send to the desk.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wyoming yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Before the amendment is read—and I think I am familiar with its contents—let me ask the Senator whether it is not his interpretation of the amendment that if the Senate should adopt it forthwith, the Committee on Appropriations must review the appropriation bills already passed and to be passed and take out of them under a mandatory direction 10 percent of the nondefense expenditures, fixed charges and so on eliminated? Is that correct?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator is not exactly correct. The amendment would have to go to conference and would have to be approved by the House of Representatives. Of course, the Senate could adopt a resolution instructing its own committee, but that would not be a particularly effective thing to do, since, if we are to have effective action, I feel it must be taken by both Houses of Congress.

Mr. TYDINGS. Of course, my question presupposed that the other House would concur, and that it would be signed and become a law. It was my interpretation of the amendment, and of the remarks of the Senator, that if the amendment ran the legislative gantlet successfully the Committees on Appropriations of both Houses, acting separately, would immediately revamp the appropriation bills passed and to be passed to effect the savings within the limitations set forth. Is that correct?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. There is nothing in the amendment, as I drafted it hastily yesterday, which fixes a time limit. If it were desired to fix a specific date by which time a report should be made to the Congress, that would have to be written into the amendment.

Mr. TYDINGS. Would the Senator object to inserting an amendment which would compel the work to be done prior to January 1, 1941?

Mr. BYRD rose.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I should be very glad to accept such a suggestion, and I will now offer it, prior to the statement of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. Let me say to the Senator from Maryland that if we postpone any reduction of present appropriations to January 1 it will mean a delay of 6 months before the reduction would apply, and one-half of possible savings would be lost.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is true, but the committee would have to have some time to do the work.

Mr. BYRD. Let me suggest to the Senator from Maryland that we are to remain in session, we are not to adjourn, and the committee could report in 30 days.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wyoming yield to me?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. It was not my idea, I will say to the Senator from Virginia, that the committee would not report before January 1, 1941. It was my idea that they must make their report before that time, in a month or two months, if they could do it.

Mr. BYRD. If January 1, 1941, should be fixed as the limit, that would be the time when the report would be made.

Will the Senator from Wyoming yield to me a moment further?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. BYRD. In the debate yesterday I stated that I expected to offer an amendment similar to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I did not hear that statement of the Senator, and had I known that he had written or was about to write such an amendment, I would not have attempted to take precedence, as it were.

Mr. BYRD. I fully understand that. After the Senator from Kentucky has cut the enacting clause out of the mandatory economy provision, I am willing to accept any proposal which may lead to some economy in the nondefense appropriations, although I think that a mandatory reduction, such as was first proposed, would have been very much more effective, and would have been certain to obtain results.

After the clerk has read the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming, I should like to have him read the amendment which has been prepared at my suggestion by the legislative counsel, in the hope that the Senator from Wyoming, while I have no desire whatever to take away from him the authorship of the amendment, may accept at least two features of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia, namely, that there be a joint congressional committee appointed, to consist of so many members from each of the Committees on Appropriations——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator, I doubt the advisability of the appointment of such a joint committee, for the reason that the proposal is being made in this body now. The House of Representatives has a Committee on Appropriations, and I doubt whether it would be good tactics, or the proper course of procedure, for this body to suggest a joint committee without first having received the approval of the Committee on Appropriations of the House. If it is desired that a joint committee be appointed, that can be done by the conferees.

Mr. BYRD. The difficulty I can see about the course proposed by the Senator from Wyoming is that he proposes two committees to make suggestions as to reductions, acting separately and independently. I think that it would be very difficult to operate in that way.

The next suggestion I wanted to make to the Senator was that the committee should report to the Senate and House of Representatives within 30 days after the enactment of the joint resolution.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I was about to suggest, following the remarks of the Senator from Maryland, that the amendment might be amended so as to require that the report be made on or before September 1. Would that be satisfactory to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BYRD. That would be satisfactory.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I modify the amendment, to insert after the word "report", in line 4, the words "on or before September 1, 1940."

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wyoming yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the Senator from Wyoming has been very constructive throughout the debate, and his amendment certainly is constructive and designed to accomplish the purpose, and to meet certain well-founded objections.

What I am about to say I do not want to be taken as a reflection on the purpose or the method proposed, but I make this observation to the Senator from Wyoming as to what will probably happen: When the committee brings in its report, we should not be too optimistic of savings being accomplished, because every group affected will immediately get in contact with some of us in an endeavor to show why the appropriation for their particular activity should not be reduced. I say now that I shall be agreeably surprised if the report of the Committee on Economy, so-called, accomplishes any result whatsoever. I really believe that a 3 percent mandatory reduction would probably save more money than we think may be saved by the well-intentioned and well-presented amendment now offered by the Senator from Wyoming, because in the House they will have one opinion, in the Senate we will have another opinion; there will be a divergence of opinion; the joint resolution will have to be signed by the President; Senators themselves will fall out over the manner and method of the economy; and in the end we will probably get no economy.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Wyoming, I should like to ask that, for the information of the Senate, the clerk read the amendment prepared by the Senator from Virginia, not for the purpose of displacing the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I suggest that the amendment which I sent to the desk be stated first, and then that the amendment of the Senator from Virginia be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to insert in lieu of section 403, as amended, the following:

SEC. 403. The Committees on Appropriations of the Senate and House of Representatives are hereby directed to review the appropriation bills for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and to report on or before September 1, 1940, such amendments thereto as will effect a total reduction of $500,000,000 in the civil expense of the Government without impairing efficiency.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will now state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD].

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to insert in lieu of section 403, as amended, the following:

SEC. 403. There is hereby established a joint congressional committee to be composed of —— Members of the Senate who are members of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and —— Members of the House of Representatives who are members of the House Committee on Appropriations, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. A vacancy in the joint committee shall not affect the powers of the remaining members to execute the functions of the joint committee and shall be filled in the same manner as the original selection.

(b) The joint committee shall review House Joint Resolution 544 and all general appropriation bills for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and shall report to the Senate and the House of Representatives within 30 days after the date of the enactment of this act recommendations, with respect to the appropriations contained in such resolution and bills, for an aggregate reduction of $500,000,000 in such appropriations. Appropriations for national defense purposes shall not be included in such recommendations.

(c) The joint committee, or any subcommittee thereof, shall have power to hold hearings and to sit and act at such times as it deems advisable. The joint committee is authorized to utilize the services, information, facilities, and personnel of the departments and agencies in the Executive branch of the Government.

(d) The authority conferred by this section shall expire on the date of submission of the above-mentioned recommendations to the Congress.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I think this matter has been sufficiently discussed so that it is clear to all Senators, and I have no desire to take further time.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. I should like to ascertain from the Senator, if I may, what his view is as to the practical operation of the amendment if it were enacted. I notice on the last page of the calendar of business a column giving the status of the appropriation bills. I observe that there have been considered by the two Houses at this session of Congress the following appropriation bills: Independent offices, 1941; urgent deficiency, 1940; Treasury and Post Office, 1941; Agricultural Appropriation Act, 1941; State, Commerce, and Justice, 1941; first deficiency, 1940; Interior Department, 1941; legislative, 1941; Labor, Federal Security, 1941.

There is being reported today by the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate another deficiency or emergency bill.

As I construe the amendment, the various appropriation bills which have already been considered by both Houses will be referred to the Appropriations Committees, and if the Appropriation Committees perform the duties prescribed by the amendment it will be necessary for the several bills to be referred to the usual subcommittees which have already made a study of them; they would be set down for hearings, and hearings would be had in order intelligently to revise the appropriation items contained in each bill in order to carry out the purposes of the amendment.

I am forced to the conclusion that the probability is that about as much time would be taken up in revamping and revising the bills which have already been so carefully considered by both Houses, and the Appropriations Committees of both Houses, as was consumed in the original consideration of the bills.

If the Senator from Wyoming has a shorter cut toward a revision of these bills so as to effect the 10 percent or other reduction in the total amount of appropriations for civil functions, I should like to be advised.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I do not think it would be necessary for the committees to go through all the procedure outlined by the Senator from Louisiana. I rather conceive that, in the interest of expeditious action, if the conferees did not determine upon a joint committee, as they might very well do, each of the committees, by submitting the appropriation bills to the budget officers of the respective departments, could very speedily obtain recommendations or suggestions from the departments as to where cuts might most readily be made.

I have in mind very clearly an action on the part of one of the subcommittees of the Senate Committee on Appropriations a couple of years ago when the matter of reducing expenditures was under consideration. It called upon one of the departments to make forthwith a suggestion to the committee as to where cuts could most effectively be made without impairing the efficiency of the department, and, as I recall, the report was received by the committee within 3 days.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, if that statement be correct, and the matter would be handled as expeditiously as that; and the committee would accept the Budget estimates of reduction, then I think it would be infinitely preferable to adopt the amendment suggested by the Senator from Virginia and reported by the committee, requiring a 10-percent reduction, because as the Senator from Wyoming himself pointed out yesterday, the estimates of reduction would be made by the Bureau of the Budget and submitted to the President for his approval. That is the expeditious way.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The whole point of the amendment is that the responsibility shall be upon Congress and the work shall be done by Congress, which knows what it wants when it makes the appropriations, and that we shall not be obliged to accept whatever may be handed to us by the Bureau of the Budget.

Mr. OVERTON. I should say in reply to the Senator from Wyoming that if we meet our responsibility we will not accept the estimates submitted by the Bureau of the Budget, but we will set down all the different items for hearings again, and we will go through the same processes under which we reported the original bills. There is no escape from that conclusion.

Certainly the Department of the Interior should be heard on a question of the reduction of its appropriations. The State Department and other departments of the Government should also be heard. They would be entitled to hearings. We ought to give the same number of days to hearings, and take the same amount of testimony as was presented in connection with the consideration of the original bills.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Louisiana is making it appear unnecessarily difficult. The hearings have just been held. We have the record of the hearings. The various subcommittees now know upon what they acted. I think it would be a comparatively simple matter for Congress to undertake to make the cut if it desired to do so. If Congress does not desire to give itself the trouble of making the cut, and wishes—to adopt the language which was suggested by a Member of this body yesterday—to "pass the buck" back to the Bureau of the Budget, that is another matter, but it is not the democratic way of proceeding.

Mr. OVERTON. I submit to the learned Senator from Wyoming that it is much more difficult to cut appropriations than it is to approve them or to increase them, and what we have been doing is approving or increasing Budget estimates, and when it comes to reducing the appropriation we shall find that it is much more difficult and probably involves a much longer process than in preparing and presenting the original bill.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I should like to address a question to the Senator from Wyoming with respect to his proposed amendment. As I read the Senator's amendment it provides for no limitation. Therefore, the cut, if a cut should be accomplished by the committee, could be on the salary side. Fixed charges are not considered in any respect, or eliminated. So that the Senator's amendment may afford an avenue for a direct drive at cutting down salaries of Federal employees. Am I correct in that statement?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I do not think that would follow.

Mr. McCARRAN. It is left wide open to the committee to cut in that direction just as much as in another; is that not true?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Of course, whatever recommendation is made would have to be made to the Congress.

Mr. McCARRAN. Why cannot we make the recommendation in the amendment?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I have no objection to a provision that it is not the intention to make any salary cut.

Mr. McCARRAN. That it is not the intention to cut fixed charges, including salaries?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes.

Mr. McCARRAN. Would the Senator offer such a change to his own amendment?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming a question. If he is not going to reduce salaries, how does he propose to reduce the appropriation? He is obliged to recognize that he must either reduce the salaries or the number of employees. The saving the Senator specifies as mandatory in his amendment would result in the discharge of approximately 25,000 Federal employees—probably more.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I do not think that follows at all.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Assume the average salary is $2,000 a year—that is too high, but let us assume the average salary is $2,000 a year—then as I understand, it would be necessary to discharge about 25,000 employees in order to effect the saving suggested.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I modify my amendment by adding at the end thereof the phrase:

Provided, That no reduction of salaries of Government employees or of fixed charges and trust funds shall be reported.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. How can the Congress of today limit the action of the Congress of tomorrow? It makes no difference what provision is made as to limitation with respect to salaries. In any year when a bill comes up a drive can be made, and salaries can be reduced by the Congress.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator is only saying what I said in response to the question of the Senator from Alabama. In the last analysis, the Senate itself and the House itself will be the judges as to what reductions will be made.

Mr. OVERTON. So the limitation which the Senator undertakes to place upon the authority of the Congress in acting upon the bills is a mere brutum fulmen. It amounts to nothing; it is not a limitation in law or in fact.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I made the point in order to satisfy the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] and to make it clear that it was not my intention to reduce salaries.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. BYRD. What is the Senator's interpretation of "civil expenses"? His amendment provides for $500,000,000 reduction "in the civil expenses of the Government." What does he consider to be civil expenses?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I think the civil expenses are nonmilitary expenses, nondefense expenses.

Mr. BYRD. Are they not the ordinary and regular expenses of the Government? The ordinary interpretation of "civil expenses" would be what is termed the "regular, ordinary expenses," would it not?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I should think so.

Mr. BYRD. Would the relief appropriation be considered as an ordinary expenditure?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. BYRD. That is carried in a separate joint resolution.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is not a defense expense.

Mr. BYRD. Would veterans' pensions be considered a civil expense?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes; I think they would be.

Mr. BYRD. And they would be subject to reduction under this amendment. Would the social-security grants be considered as a civil expense?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the Senator is raising questions which were not passed upon in connection with the amendment which the Senator sponsored and which was reported by the committee.

Mr. BYRD. The Senator is in error. These particular items were exempted in the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia. Veterans' pensions were exempted. Social security grants were exempted. Agricultural Adjustment Administration benefit payments to farmers, by reason of the fact that the contracts had already been made, were exempted.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The purpose is to exempt them, and if my language is not appropriate to accomplish that purpose I am willing to change it.

Mr. BYRD. We are passing serious legislation. I want the Senator to make clear, either by actual language in his amendment, or in some other way, by explanation to the Senate, what he means by "civil expense." He says he means that veterans' pensions are a civil expenditure. My amendment exempted veterans' pensions. The social-security grants to the States are certainly a civil expense.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator from Virginia was the sponsor of the amendment reported by the committee which exempted appropriations for national defense, fixed charges, and trust funds. By the language of my amendment I take it that all three of those items are exempted.

Mr. BYRD. Why does the Senator so take it? The amendment does not exempt them. It says "civil expenses."

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Because I have interpreted "civil expenses" to mean expenses which are not for national defense.

Mr. BYRD. Can the Senator interpret legislation on the floor of the Senate? Legislation speaks for itself.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Legislation is interpreted not only by the language in the bill, but also by the interpretations which are announced upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. BYRD. If such interpretations are erroneous, however, the language of the bill will be the determining factor, and not what the Senator from Wyoming says it means.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. How does the Senator from Virginia suggest that the amendment be modified?

Mr. BYRD. I am not making a suggestion. I simply want to know what we are voting on when we vote for the Senator's amendment. I assume that he has given it consideration, and that he is in a position to tell us exactly what "civil expenses" mean. I had to answer similar questions in connection with my amendment.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Wyoming are apparently endeavoring to accomplish the same purpose. I announced at the outset that I did not offer the amendment in order to supplant any amendment which the Senator from Virginia was offering.

Mr. BYRD. I accept the statement of the Senator. I accepted it earlier.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. As I stated, my purpose in drafting the amendment was to provide that Congress, and not the executive department, should undertake to make the reductions. My purpose is to draw the language in such form that the reduction will be made upon the items which the Senator from Virginia believes should be reduced.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Senator very much, and I assume that he will modify his amendment accordingly, because the present language does not accomplish that purpose.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. As I have suggested the amendment, I am under the impression that it does.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I wish to say only a few words with reference to this matter, from the standpoint of the Appropriations Committee. I do not speak for the committee. In fact, I have not spoken to any member of the committee about this amendment. The committee was in conference on the relief joint resolution last night until 12 o'clock, and has been busy all morning.

However, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to these facts:

During the course of the debate there has been a rather general agreement that to bring about any large reduction in appropriations we should have to resort to the agricultural bill, the relief bill, and the bill carrying appropriations for the Civilian Conservation Corps. Because of that fact, I wish to put into the RECORD the figures as to those appropriations.

As to the agricultural bill, the estimate submitted by the President asked for $720,924,619. As the bill was reported to the Senate, it carried appropriations of $922,864,688. As it passed the Senate it carried $922,911,213.

When the bill containing the appropriations for the Civilian Conservation Corps was submitted, the estimate submitted by the President was for $230,000,000. It was reported by the Appropriations Committee at $230,000,000. The Senate then proceeded to add $50,000,000 to that appropriation.

The relief measure was submitted, not several months ago, but only last week, and passed the Senate only last Saturday night. The estimate submitted by the President was for $1,126,055,000. It was reported to the Senate by the Appropriations Committee at $1,073,584,916. When it came to the Senate last week the Senate, which now wants to economize, added approximately $151,206,000.

Therefore, if the Senate had not exceeded the recommendations of the Appropriations Committee with respect to the relief measure and the Civilian Conservation Corps bill, we should have saved $201,000,000, which is now desired to be saved. Therefore, the fault is not with the Appropriations Committee. The bills, as reported, contained $201,000,000 less than they carried when passed by the Senate. In effect, the Senate said, "You have cut down these appropriations unwisely. In exercising our prerogative, we are going to restore them."

So far as the Budget estimates are concerned, the amount requested by the President for the three bills is $450,722,000 less than the total amount carried in the bills as passed by the Senate. In other words, to understand the situation, we added to the estimates submitted by the President $450,000,000, which is the amount we have been discussing as desirable to save at the present time.

With that statement, Mr. President, I ask permission to insert in the RECORD at this point a statement showing the exact figures with regard to the bills I have been discussing.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AGRICULTURE BILL

Estimates	$720,924,619
Reported to Senate	922,864,688
Passed Senate	922,911,213

RELIEF MEASURE

Estimates	1,126,055,000
Reported to Senate	1,073,584,916
Passed Senate	1,224,791,357

C. C. C. IN LABOR BILL

Estimates	230,000,000
Reported to Senate	230,000,000
Passed Senate	280,000,000

Mr. BYRNES. If the Congress, through legislation, should ask the Appropriations Committee to review these bills and to consider reductions in all matters which are not essential for military and naval purposes, that can be done. The committee might be of the same opinion it was last week about the relief joint resolution when it reported a measure carrying $150,000,000 less than the amount fixed by the Senate last Saturday night.

The Senate Appropriations Committee has no objection to recommending reductions, but its members exercised the best judgment they had when they reported the bills to the Senate. The Senate added a substantial amount; and a week after it increased the amount it now says, "We want you to go back and review those bills and tell us how we can cut them." My only objection is that there is no way by which we can provide that the Senate shall not proceed to add more money to what the Appropriations Committee reports, if it should make another report and recommend certain reductions.

It is now proposed that the Senate shall say, "We have acted on these bills. We added $450,000,000 more than you recommended. We know we were wrong, and we want you to go back and cut it out." If the Appropriations Committee is given the power to make reductions which will stand, the committee can do so; but if we are merely to reiterate the recommendations previously made, I am afraid we shall not make much headway.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I shall be glad to yield in just a moment.

Mr. President, I do not mean to say that I would seriously advocate such a course. I do not intend to offer any amendment. I am simply calling attention to the facts and saying that, if there is any way by which the Congress can empower the Appropriations Committee to legislate on the subject and cut out $450,000,000, it will be cut out. But if the Appropriations Committee is merely to report, we must be fair with ourselves and with the country and say that many difficulties are involved.

A moment ago I mentioned the matter to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], who had charge of the agricultural appropriation bill, in an effort to determine what commitments had been made with reference to parity payments. If anything of this kind is to be done, it certainly ought to be done before commitments are made, because the Appropriations Committee cannot, on the 1st of September, after contracts are made, make a report as to how to effect a reduction of $450,000,000. Departments are authorized to make contracts for construction and for other purposes. After they have made such contracts it is very difficult to cancel them. We may not cut salaries and we may not violate contracts. That being true, I know that the Senate will be fair enough to realize the difficulties under which we would labor.

If it is desired to follow the course suggested, as one member of the Appropriations Committee, I shall do my best to cooperate. I hope the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], who is always energetic, may be made chairman of such a committee, and that my friend from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] may be a member of the committee. I should cooperate with them in an effort to bring about a reduction of $450,000,000. If there were any way in which such a cut could be made to stick, the desired result might be accomplished. However, after the committee has brought back its report, the recommendation must come before the Senate and the House; and various Members of Congress will say, "You made the cut in the wrong place. If you had cut over here, we would be entirely satisfied with it." There would be strong objection to a cut in the parity payments, or in the appropriations of the Civilian Conservation Corps, a most popular organization——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Do not forget the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation.

Mr. BYRNES. Only last Saturday afternoon three-fourths of the Senate voted in favor of adding $100,000,000 for the Surplus Commodities Corporation, and by a vote instructed its conferees to stand by the increase. Last night, when I hope some Senators were asleep, the ambassadors representing the Senate were fighting to demand that the House agree to add $100,000,000 for which there was no Budget estimate, $100,000,000 more than the Appropriations Committee wanted. The hour of midnight found us fighting to stand by the action of the Senate. It is now proposed that the Senate say, "We did not mean it. We want you to take back all those bills and cut $450,000,000 out of them."

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. If the Senator from South Carolina is seeking a stipulation that the action of the Appropriations Committee shall be binding and final, I hope he will also include a stipulation that the Appropriations Committee shall not be subjected to the ridicule and abuse sometimes heaped on our heads when we recommend reductions on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. BYRNES. Our spirits are all right, but our bodies are bruised and broken. [Laughter.] We have been run over so many times that that is our normal condition. We expect it, and we are seldom disappointed. As a Senator suggests, it is a "natural gait." We know, when we report reductions, what will happen to us. Therefore, we are not complaining. If we are to bring in a recommendation in September, or at the conclusion of any recess of Congress, and then the recommendation is to be disregarded, that is all right. I only should like to make sure that there is no way by which it could be added to.

Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. TYDINGS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield first to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to suggest that if the amendment were adopted, and the matter were referred to a committee composed of three members of the Senate Appropriations Committee and three members of the House Appropriations Committee, as I believe the amendment provides, there would have to be hearings, and the executive department would be the only one to advise as to where appropriations could be cut, anyway. So it seems to me that to give the authority to the President to make the reductions would be better than submitting the matter to a committee, because the two subcommittees of the Appropriations Committees provided for by the amendment would undoubtedly have to go to the executive department and ascertain what they thought could be saved, and act upon that recommendation. Instead of going about it a roundabout way, the Committee on Appropriations having done its best in the matter already, why not adopt an amendment authorizing the President to make such reductions as he can?

Mr. BYRNES. The purpose stated by the Senator from Wyoming was to avoid the delegation of power to the President.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I will yield in a moment. I realize that there has been so much discussion on this question that I should not take much time on it, but, of course, the President has the power. Members of the Senate say the President will not exercise the power, but it must be said in behalf of the President that the figures show in three nonmilitary or nondefense bills we have added $450,000,000 to the amount asked for by the President.

What occurred was that the President last September, believing, as he did, that the Nation should spend more for national defense, added to the estimates in the case of all bills providing for national defense and reduced the estimates for bills providing for civil functions of the Government.

If we look back 4 months or 5 months or 6 months ago, we will remember that when the Budget was submitted there were two criticisms. One was that the President was unnecessarily alarmed about the Army and Navy appropriations and was proposing that they be increased to a figure higher than was justified. The other criticism was that the President, in adding to them because of his interest in increased appropriations for the national defense, had done it at the expense of the farmer and at the expense of those on relief, and it was intimated that the Congress would add to the agricultural bill and add to the relief bill, and deduct the amounts added from the estimates for national defense.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I will yield when I finish the statement. As chairman of the naval appropriations subcommittee, I knew that sentiment existed to such an extent in the Senate that I would not report and did not report the naval bill until there was considerable activity across the water and there was an invasion of Norway. Then, when the naval bill was reported, the Senate came to the same view the President had in December, and the naval bill was passed without a dissenting vote; but I then knew, as I know now, that so long as some of the best Members of the Senate with whom I have been associated talked about the war being a "phony" war and entertained the idea that the President had deliberately reduced the estimates for agriculture and relief, they were determined to cut appropriations for the Army and the Navy. We could not have passed the billion-dollar appropriation bill for the Navy 1 month before it was passed.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am very much interested in the earlier observations of the Senator from South Carolina. He has stated more comprehensively and thoroughly and with more point what is likely to happen if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming shall be adopted. I do not feel that it would be worth the effort of the committee proposed to be set up unless the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming authorized the Appropriations Committee to make the cut, and then there was a rule or a prohibition that the Senate must vote the recommendation either up or down. If it were allowed to be amended on the floor, it would be a futile and wasted effort. The only way this saving can be made, if the Senate wants it to be made, is to have the committees go over it and finally ascertain where the savings can be made, and then bring the report on the floor and either vote it up or vote it down. If we do not do that, the whole thing will go for naught.

Mr. O'MAHONEY and Mr. SHIPSTEAD addressed the chair.

Mr. BYRNES. I yield first to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am very glad the Senator from South Carolina has made the observations which he has just concluded. I agree completely with what he has said with respect to the relation of the legislative branch to the executive branch with respect to these appropriations. The charge of waste has been made repeatedly against the President by persons who ought to know that the President from the beginning has been endeavoring to keep appropriations down. We have had numerous examples of exactly what the Senator has said, notably the passage of the W. P. A. bill by this body a few days ago. I suppose no appropriation measure acted on by the Congress is subjected to more criticism than that bill, including criticism by Members of Congress when they go out upon the political stump, but when the time comes to vote upon it the bill is passed without opposition. The relief bill was passed upon this floor within a week without a single vote having been cast against it; the appropriation bill for W. P. A. a year ago was passed in this body by unanimous vote, and there were only 23 votes cast against it in the House of Representatives.

So, Mr. President, to pass anything in this body which attempts to place the responsibility for cutting expenditures upon the Executive when the responsibility is ours seems to me to be utterly wrong. My position is that if we want to reduce expenditures, if we want to talk about the effectiveness of democracy, let us see that the legislative body in the democratic manner shall undertake the work.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. BYRNES. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina what he thinks of the practicability of making a straight cut of 10 percent in all items of appropriation except trust funds and those to cover fixed charges?

Mr. BYRNES. That is the proposal of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] with one or two exceptions with relation to pensions, salaries, and other items. It can be done; there is no doubt about that. I think the language of the amendment of the Senator from Virginia would cover that, excepting, as it does, fixed charges and trust funds. Of course, I understand that after it was offered there was some agreement that it should not include salaries. The Senate and the House of Representatives can do it if they wish to reduce the salaries.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If it should be done it could be done by a committee.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. BYRNES. I wish to conclude my remarks by saying that I have no feeling about this matter at all. I simply wanted to make the statement I have about the action of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator let me ask him a question?

Mr. BYRNES. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. The approriation bills which have been enacted are now the law. Does the Senator believe that Congress by authorizing or attempting to authorize the Appropriations Committee of the two Houses to cut from the appropriations which are now the law can bring about a repeal of those appropriations to the extent that a committee might in the future decide to cut them without in any way having the two Houses pass upon the matter again? Suppose the Appropriations Committee decided to cut some item of appropriation from the Interior Department appropriation bill or the State Department appropriation bill or the appropriation bill for any other department, and the department said "Congress has appropriated this money; it is already the law and we will not recognize the act of the committee in telling us we cannot spend it."

Mr. BYRNES. I do not see any practical way by which it can be done except by the President exercising the power he has to withhold expenditures, which he can do and which he ought to do, and which I hope he will do as to many of the appropriations of this character.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, as a Senator who in the Finance Committee was an ardent supporter of the amendment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], and who intended to support it on this floor, it seems to me, in view of the action of the Senate yesterday on the Barkley amendment and on the Tydings substitute, that the straightforward, efficient, and honest thing for the Senate to do is simply to vote down the amendment of the Senator from Virginia in any form, because, to my mind, the two votes yesterday on the Barkley amendment and the Tydings substitute were an affirmative declaration by the Senate of the United States that they did not intend to do anything efficient in the way of economy or in trying to piece out by economy the taxes which it is necessary to raise in this emergency.

Mr. President, I do not see how any other conclusion can be reached. To adopt the amendment in its present form, with the word "directed" stricken out, is simply to make a gesture, and a misleading and a dishonest gesture, to the American people, seeking to lead the American people into the view that Congress has done something in the direction of economy, when every Senator knows that is not true, because simply to authorize the President to effect economies is to authorize him to do something which he already has complete power to do. It does not confer any additional jurisdiction whatever upon the President of the United States. Therefore I say it can only have the effect of a misleading gesture to the country to the effect that Congress has taken some steps in the interest of economy, which as a matter of fact it has not taken.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Missouri is one of the ablest Senators we have.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I thank the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. And ordinarily I pay a great deal of attention to what he says; but the amendment as it is now written provides as follows:

> The President is hereby authorized—

The words "and directed" have been stricken out——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. He already has the authority without the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. I know; but—

> The President is hereby authorized to reduce appropriations for the executive branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941 (except appropriations for national defense, fixed charges, and trust funds), in such manner that the total amount of such reductions shall not be less than 10 percent of the total amount of the appropriations affected. Such reductions in appropriations shall be impounded and returned to the Treasury.

This is not only a direct authorization but a direct request of the Congress to the President to make these reductions if it is possible. It is all before him.

These other appropriations are the law. The expenditure of many of the appropriations may have been already authorized, and, of course, they cannot be cut; but this amendment calls the President's attention to the matter, gives him the direct authority, and tells him what to do. I do not believe President Roosevelt or any other President of this Republic, when a law like that is passed, is going to fail to do his duty to the utmost. I believe the amendment—section 403, as amended—will bring about the highest possible reduction of expenditures that we shall get for the year 1941.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, let me say that in the many years during which I have known and admired and loved the Senator from Tennessee I have never seen him give such an exhibition of credulity as the expression of the idea that this amendment, in its present form, is anything except a mere empty gesture, because the President already has authority to withhold appropriations if he wants to do so. To request him to do so, as the Senator from Tennessee terms it, is simply to "pass the buck" to the President.

If we pass a mandatory provision of law directing the President of the United States to effect this economy, and the President of the United States signs the law—and it cannot become law without his signature, because nobody has any idea of passing such a provision over his veto—if Congress passes such a mandatory provision and the President signs it, it then becomes the law of the land, and it becomes the President's duty to carry it out. It is not a question of the delegation of legislative authority. It is not a question of "buck passing." But for Congress simply to write a letter to the President and say, "Please, Mr. President, won't you look over the thing and exercise an authority that you already have?" is purely and simply an empty gesture in the interest of economy.

Now, let us come to the proposition of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY].

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH. I have listened to this debate, and I should like to have someone who has the facts tell me what appropriations can be affected by the Byrd amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The appropriations for the next fiscal year.

Mr. SMITH. I know; but what do they consist of? What is included in the effect of the Byrd amendment?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That question was discussed yesterday by the Senator from Virginia and other Senators at much greater length than I possibly could discuss it. I did desire to proceed very briefly to consider the proposition of the Senator from Wyoming. The Senator from Virginia, of course, will be very glad to explain precisely the effect of his amendment before it was emasculated by the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. SMITH. Very well. I want to get those facts, because they might persuade me to have something to say about this matter.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator referred to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky as having emasculated some other amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. As having emasculated the amendment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], reported from the Finance Committee with only four dissenting votes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is that the amendment which struck out the word "directed"?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; that is the amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me ask the Senator a question. I voted for the Barkley amendment. The reason why I voted for it was because I regard it as beyond the proper power of Congress to direct the President to do anything.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me right at that point, of course it is a very common thing to find this expression even in drafts of legislation sent up from the executive departments and supported by the President himself. Nothing is more common than the expression, "The President is hereby authorized and directed"; and, as far as I know, the question of the authority of Congress to do that has never before been raised.

Mr. CONNALLY. I had always thought that each of the three branches of the Government had its own duties, defined under the Constitution; and in the exercise of the Executive function I do not regard it as within the province of the Congress to direct the President to do anything.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But, Mr. President, this is a legislative function. In addition to being the Executive, the President is also part of the legislative branch of the Government.

Mr. CONNALLY. We do not expect the President to come up here and perform the functions of the Congress.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. He frequently has.

Mr. CONNALLY. Probably so; but if he should undertake to do so, according to my view, I would resist it. It is not the President's function to tell the courts how to decide cases, as I have heretofore indicated in certain instances. If we are to expect the Executive to respect our functions, it is our duty to respect his functions. What could we do about the matter if he did not do it? All we can do is to request him to do it. If the President did not do it, the Congress could do nothing about it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the Congress passes a law, and the President signs it, and it becomes a law of the United States, directing the President to do something, and he does not do it, it is like any other failure on the part of any individual officer to perform his sworn duty.

Mr. CONNALLY. If I were President of the United States, I would not sign any such bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That would be the privilege of the Senator if he were President of the United States, which the Senator might be and which I would be glad to see.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not anticipate ever being President or Vice President. Fortunately, the little bug has not yet stung me that has deranged so many minds and so many ambitions.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am sure no bug ever stung the Senator which could for a moment impair his majestic intellect or disturb his impressive dignity.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. I call the attention of the Senator from Texas to the fact that frequently the word "shall" is used in connection with the President. We provide, in various acts of Congress, that the President shall do so and so.

Take the case of the Neutrality Act of 1939. It provides that whenever the President, or Congress by concurrent resolution, shall find a certain state of facts to exist, the President shall issue a proclamation naming the states involved. It provides that he shall from time to time, by proclamation, name other states as and when they become involved in war. The same language was used in the Reorganization Act.

"Shall" is just as effective as "direct." If there is any objection to the word "direct," as used in my amendment, I shall be very glad, indeed, to substitute the word "shall." It is frequently used.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I now desire briefly to advert to the substitute proposed by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY]. That also seems to me to be an empty gesture.

It has been suggested here that the Appropriations Committee be instructed to report not later than the 1st of January 1941. Of course, we know that by the 1st of January 1941 half of the fiscal year will have passed; and also by the 1st of January 1941 appropriations for the next fiscal year will be coming over from the House for consideration, and to ask the Appropriations Committee to wait until the 1st of January 1941, and then come in here and report a system of economy, with the fiscal year already half passed, which in itself would be subject to amendment, is to ask the Appropriations Committee to do an absolutely futile thing.

Another suggestion was made that the Appropriations Committee be required to report not later than the 1st of September 1940. That suggestion might have some effect if we had any assurance that the leadership in the Congress will not be successful in its announced endeavor to adjourn the Congress before the 1st of September 1940. In other words, the Appropriations Committee might go thrcugh the labor of preparing recommendations for economy, and be forced to report to Congress after the Congress had adjourned sine die.

It reminds me of an incident which took place in the Missouri Legislature when my father was the majority leader in the House of Representatives of Missouri. There used to be a Republican in the legislature in those days who rejoiced in the name of "Fire Alarm Fiannagan," who was always "viewing with alarm" some activity of the State government and always introducing resolutions to investigate those various activities. Finally, he introdueed a resolution to investigate the administration of the insane asylum over at Fulton. By that time my father was pretty tired of "Fire Alarm's" activities; so he took Flannagan's resolution and struck out all after the enacting clause, and appointed "Fire Alarm Flannagan" a committee of one to go over and investigate the insane asylum, pay his own expenses, and report back after the legislature adjourned sine die. [Laughter.] So I greatly fear that the substitute of the Senator from Wyoming would simply be another empty gesture to try to assure the country that Congress had done something in the interest of economy when, in fact, they had actually accomplished nothing.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I am sure that the Congress of the United States does not act upon the Missouri precedent.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am not so certain. I have seen some precedents here very closely equivalent to the action which took place in Missouri, and I greatly fear that that exact situation might exist if we adopted the substitute offered by the Senator from Wyoming, holding ourselves out to the country as having accomplished something for economy, and then the leadership succeeded in adjourning the Congress before the committee could report.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I hope we can get to a vote on the pending amendment, consideration of which has taken 2 days of the time of the Senate. If we can get this matter settled, perhaps we can conclude the consideration of the bill this afternoon. If not, I hope that we will remain in session tonight until we finish the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] in the nature of a substitute for the committee amendment.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the pending amendment.

Mr. BYRD. I ask that the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In lieu of section 403, as amended, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 403. The Committee on Appropriations of the Senate and House of Representatives are hereby directed to review the appropriation bills for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and to report on or before September 1, 1940, such amendments thereto as will effect a total reduction of $500,000,000 in the civil expense of the Government without impairing efficiency: Provided, That no reduction of salaries of governmental employees or of fixed charges and trust funds shall be reported.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. KING. Upon the submission of the report, will it automatically be vitalized, and so effect a reduction of $500,000,000; or will it require affirmative action upon the part of the Executive or of the Congress?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It would require action by the Congress.

Mr. KING. Obviously. Suppose Congress shall not be in session, then, and shall not be in session until the next fiscal or calendar year? When would any reduction recommended be effective if there should be a favorable report by the committee?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am assuming that Congress will be in session. Of course, if it were not in session, then Congress could not act upon the matter until the regular session in January or until a special session met.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have such a high regard for the Senator from Wyoming that any suggestion from him arrests my attention and usually commands my support. I am not certain as to the benefits which might be derived if his amendment were adopted. It is impossible to determine just what the effects will be if a number of suggested amendments are enacted into law. No one can foretell what amount of revenue will be derived from the bill if enacted into law, or what taxes should be imposed in order to meet the situation in which our country finds itself. Much as we may desire to be realistic and to frame revenue measures along prudent, just, and indeed scientific lines, we are beset with such uncertainty as to make it almost impossible to pursue that course. We cannot ignore the chaotic and dangerous conditions prevailing in the world today. We cannot determine, as I have indicated, the amount of revenue which must be collected, and the form of taxes which must be imposed, in order to meet the imperative demands of the Government. We are not an isolated unit; we may not frame our tax laws, based solely upon domestic needs, in a period when there is lacking a reasonable degree of sanity and peace in the world, and when our entire economy is profoundly disturbed.

When the world is on fire our legislation may not ignore the conflagration and be limited exclusively to domestic peacetime conditions. It is admitted by all that our revenues must be greatly increased, thus imposing an increasingly heavy burden upon the American people. Only a few years ago the expenditures of the Government did not exceed $1,000,000,000. For the fiscal year ending June 30 of this year our expenditures will, in my opinion, be in excess of $9,000,000,000. What they will be for the coming year it is impossible to determine. It is certain that with the demands for national preparedness there will be a very great increase in national expenditures.

It would be unrealistic to talk about balancing the Budget within the next 2 or 3 years; indeed, there are many students of our economy and our national trends, including world conditions, who foresee a long period of increasing expenditures which will result in greater deficits for an indefinite period. However, conditions such as those confronting our country today demand that reasonable efforts shall be made to preserve the financial strength and integrity of the Government. A peril to all governments is inflation. The national credit must be maintained, and to that end every possible step should be taken which would prevent inflation, or arouse apprehensions that the financial strength of the Government may be undermined. Senators are familiar with the dangers of inflation—the inevitable consequences that flow from a persistent and long-continued unbalanced Budget.

When world conditions interrupt or destroy international trade and commerce, the economic and industrial foundations of communities and nations are weakened and often destroyed. We may not, for the moment, experience the effect of commotions in other parts of the world, but sooner or later most serious repercussions will follow and the economic and business life of the people be materially affected. We must not permit emotionalism or hysteria or fears to affect our judgment or lead to the adoption of unsound measures of a domestic nature, or those which fall within the category of international relations. As I have stated, we are part of the world. We cannot live to ourselves alone as much as many might desire. We must not embark upon an uncharted sea in the matter of expenditures, nor in our international policies. We must have an objective and not be swerved by hysteria or fears from the path of safety and of honor. I recognize as all do that being a part of the world we owe something to the world and the world owes something to us.

Primarily our duty is to our families, to our communities, to our States, and to our Nation. In the midst of world convulsions there must be one nation which is unmoved by the tumultuous seas and the waves of international passion. This great Nation, many believe—and I am one who does so believe—was destined by a divine Providence to be a light and guide in days of international troubles; and when shadows, fears, and darkness develop we know that peoples in many lands have looked to this Republic as the symbol of liberty and justice and as a great lighthouse shedding its rays to guide distressed peoples over troubled and dangerous seas. The foundations of this great Republic must not be weakened.

In many parts of the world there are millions of people deprived of their homes, wandering, suffering, dying. Many governments lie in ruins and the heavy hand of despotic rulers and cruel systems is laid upon them. This Nation may have brought succor and help to millions of unhappy people; it may have extended the hand of mercy and ameliorated the sufferings of millions in many parts of the world. It may likewise, as I have indicated, inspire hope and give courage to the distressed in order that liberty and hope may not be forever destroyed.

Undoubtedly the enormous demands which are being made and which will be made upon the American people for national defense will, as I have stated, greatly increase the burden of taxation which they will be called upon to meet. During the World War the administration determined upon a policy which would, so far as possible, prevent inflation, and, accordingly, efforts were made as Dr. Benjamin M. Anderson, professor of economics of the University of California at Los Angeles, states in the Economic Bulletin of May 23, 1940—

To avoid recourse to commercial banks as a primary reliance for financing the Government.

As we know, taxes were heavily increased in order, so far as possible, to maintain a sound and stable fiscal policy and to maintain the Government's credit. It was recognized that dangers would result from enormous deficits without the application of a sound system of taxation. Revenues obtained from many sources which theretofore had not been tapped. It was believed that it was important to take as much of the current increase of the people, in taxes and loans, as were possible, and the result was "investors' money and taxpayers' money paid for most of the war. Commercial bank expansion paid a very minor part of it."

Congress was determined to guard the public credit, to prevent inflation, and at the same time to enact tax legislation which would give to the Government a large part of the expenses incurred in meeting its war obligations. At the beginning of the World War the national indebtedness was small, and every effort was made to enact those measures and adopt those policies that would keep Federal expenditures within reasonable bounds and prevent dangerous inflationary movements. In the interests of our Government and in the interest of our future development, it is imperative that we shall limit appropriations to the needs of the Government. In other words, that there shall be economy, even when we are faced with difficulties, not to say dangers, from external causes.

It is difficult to determine just where we should apply the pruning knife and limit appropriations. There might be a reduction in the salaries of Federal employees; a similar suggestion was made by President Roosevelt and adopted for a limited period. Obviously we could reduce many of the activities of the Government, but in so doing it might abridge needed and important enterprises, with resulting injury to thousands of persons engaged in public and private activities. When there is a reduction in salaries, it strikes most heavily upon individuals who are receiving compensation in what might be called the lower brackets. Disturbed economic conditions resulting from wars, and from other causes, usually disturb the price structure, causing increased prices of most, if not all, commodities. Certainly that is true if the fiscal and other policies result in inflation.

When limitations upon appropriations are sought, it must be remembered that those receiving small salaries and limited compensation are the ones who suffer most; so, when we speak about reducing salaries of the employees of the Government and employees in industry, it must not be forgotten that an increase in prices, together with inflation, results in still higher prices and mounting costs of commodities, subjecting to undue pressure those of small incomes. They are the ones who suffer most severely.

Mr. President, I wish it were possible to reduce Federal expenditures. I have often during the past few years criticized many appropriations and have insisted upon economy in all branches of the Government.

Mr. President, this situation, as I understand it, compels our Government to adopt a broad, sound, and realistic defense policy. Europe and Asia, and, indeed, nearly all parts of the world, present contests and confusion and dangerous forces which threaten the foundations of many governments. Ambitious men are seeking increased power, and democratic nations are being trodden underfoot. Communism and nazi-ism have cooperated in the destruction of governments. They have destroyed liberal and progressive nations. Communists seized the Russian Government and announced their purpose to impose their ideology upon all nations.

Within the past few days several small nations have been brought under the domination of Stalin, and in a number of European countries many of the people fear invasion at the hands of communistic Russia.

I might add there are Communists in the United States who are directed by Bolshevik Russia and their efforts will be made to weaken democratic institutions and to superimpose communistic philosophy upon the American people.

As I have indicated, there are Communists in the United States, and there are resistant elements and forces which seek to prevent the adoption of measures calculated to protect communities and the Government from the insidious efforts of destructive forces. Nazi-ism has demonstrated its strength, and, having destroyed a number of democratic nations in Europe, it has its emissaries in various parts of the Western Hemisphere. Only yesterday, because, in the opinion of many, efforts might be made by European totalitarian states to obtain footholds in Latin America, the Senate discussed the Monroe Doctrine and reaffirmed its determination to maintain that doctrine.

The danger signals in many parts of the world compel the American people to take cognizance of the disturbing forces regnant in many countries and to adopt measures for the protection of this Republic and the enforcement of the Monroe Doctrine. Perhaps we have been too indifferent to the ominous signs appearing on the world's horizon and have closed our eyes to the growing storm which in recent years has broken upon the world. Following the World War there was not only a hope but a belief that policies of peace would be adopted, that barriers among nations would be removed, and that there would be cooperation among the peoples of the world for the promotion not only of peace and fellowship but for the advancement of the material, moral, and spiritual interests of all.

It is apparent that too much was expected by the people, and as a result we find the world today divided, nations armed against nations, and fear and hatred directing and controlling the lives and conduct of hundreds of millions of people. Instead of peace, there is war. Instead of fellowship, there are feelings of hate and revenge. Indeed, it is thought by many that the condition of the world even in dark periods was not more pregnant with evil than the days in which we live.

These tragic conditions may not be ignored, and the obligation rests upon our Government to adopt those measures that will defend it from all enemies, foreign and domestic. That means that heavy burdens of taxation must be imposed upon the people and that larger revenues must be obtained; that many of the resources of our Government must be devoted to military preparations for the defense of our country; and that readjustments will be required—indeed, compelled—in many activities of our citizens.

Under these circumstances, and in view of the uncertainty of the effect of the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming, I feel constrained, much as I should like to vote for legitimate reductions, to vote for the amendment. If reductions are to be made, Congress should make them and not devolve the responsibility upon the President. I am willing to vote for reductions if we can ascertain just where our dangers are and where reductions would be justified in the light of all conditions, including our industrial and economic situation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], as modified, to the committee amendment.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I ask for the yeas and nays, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Donahey	Lodge	Schwellenbach
Andrews	Downey	Lucas	Sheppard
Ashurst	Ellender	Lundeen	Shipstead
Austin	George	McCarran	Smathers
Bailey	Gerry	McKellar	Smith
Bankhead	Gillette	McNary	Taft
Barkley	Green	Maloney	Thomas, Idaho
Bilbo	Guffey	Mead	Thomas, Okla.
Bone	Gurney	Miller	Thomas, Utah
Bridges	Hale	Minton	Tobey
Brown	Harrison	Murray	Townsend
Bulow	Hatch	Neely	Truman
Burke	Hayden	Norris	Tydings
Byrd	Herring	Nye	Vandenberg
Byrnes	Hill	O'Mahoney	Van Nuys
Capper	Holman	Overton	Wagner
Caraway	Holt	Pepper	Walsh
Chandler	Hughes	Pittman	Wheeler
Chavez	Johnson, Calif.	Radcliffe	White
Clark, Idaho	Johnson, Colo.	Reed	Wiley
Clark, Mo.	King	Reynolds
Connally	La Follette	Russell
Danaher	Lee	Schwartz

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I have asked for the yeas and nays.

Let me say that my amendment proposes that Congress shall undertake the responsibility of economy, and I trust that Senators will permit a yea-and-nay vote upon the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHANDLER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS]. I am advised that he would vote as I intend to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. I am informed that if he were present and voting he would vote as I shall vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MINTON. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is unavoidably detained. I am advised that if present and voting he would vote "yea."

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. STEWART] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SLATTERY] are necessarily absent. If present and voting, I am advised that they would vote "nay."

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. SCHWARTZ] are detained in committee meetings.

Mr. AUSTIN. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] is detained on public business.

I announce the following pairs on this question:

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. HOLMAN], who would vote "yea," with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. STEWART], who would vote "nay"; and

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON], who would vote "yea," with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SLATTERY], who would vote "nay."

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] is absent on official duties.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. HOLMAN] is detained on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 47, as follows:

MAINTENANCE OF MONROE DOCTRINE—HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate the joint resolution which has been messaged over from the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 556) approving nonrecognition of the transfer of any geographic region in the Western Hemisphere from one non-American power to another non-American power, and providing for consultation with other American republics in the event that such transfer should appear likely, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, it appears that this joint resolution is quite similar to one passed by the Senate day before yesterday by unanimous vote and messaged to the House day before yesterday. Therefore, I move that the House joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, does the Senator mean to tell the Senate that after the Senate had passed a joint resolution the House, instead of taking up the Senate joint resolution, passed its own joint resolution?

Mr. PITTMAN. That is what happened. Day before yesterday the Senate passed a similar joint resolution by unanimous vote, and it was sent immediately to the House the same afternoon. The House joint resolution was passed yesterday in the House and today messaged to the Senate. I am moving that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations so that we may see what improvement is suggested in the House joint resolution.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the able Senator from Nevada whether it is a similar or an exact resolution.

Mr. PITTMAN. It is not exactly like the other.

Mr. McNARY. If it were, action could be taken on the floor of the Senate without referring it to the committee.

Mr. PITTMAN. A practice has arisen in the other House which is not very agreeable to the Senate. It has occurred with reference to measures handled by all the committees of this body. Bills are passed here and sent to the House, and similar bills are passed in the House and sent to the Senate. It is a practice which is not proper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Nevada that House Joint Resolution 556 be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 10104) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1940, and June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

REVENUE BILL OF 1940

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10039) to provide for the expenses of national preparedness by raising revenue and issuing bonds, to provide a method for paying for such bonds, and for other purposes.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for section 403, to read as follows:

The President is hereby authorized and directed to reduce appropriations for the executive branch of the Government for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1940 (except appropriations for national defense, fixed charges, and trust funds), in such manner that the total amount of such reductions shall not be less than 4 percent of the total amount of the appropriations affected. Such reductions in appropriations shall be impounded and returned to the Treasury.

Mr. President, although I have been over the subject two or three times, a good many Senators have been absent. For about 5 minutes I should like to have the attention of those who care to listen, to show why I believe this amendment is absolutely imperative.

For the past 10 years, from June 30, 1930, to date, the average yearly expenditures of the Government have been $7,300,000,000. The average yearly receipts of the Government have been $4,600,000,000. The average yearly deficit of the Government has been $2,700,000,000, for each year from June 30, 1930, to June 30, 1940. In order to show the deficits year by year, they are represented on this chart [indicating] and they average $2,700,000,000 a year.

Keeping in mind that the average annual deficit for the past 10 years has been $2,700,000,000, if Senators will look at these two charts they will see how much we have spent each year on the Army and Navy. This figure [indicating on chart] represents the total appropriations for the Army and Navy during the past 10 years. The expenditures for the Army and Navy combined average $1,100,000,000 a year. So, if we subtract what we have spent on the Army and Navy each year from our average yearly deficit, it will be seen that there is a $1,600,000,000 annual deficit for each year of the past 10 years without a penny going for national defense at all during that period.

The pending tax bill, if enacted, will raise, it is estimated, about a billion dollars a year. The amendment which has just been rejected would have saved $500,000,000 if it had been finally effective. But even in that event we would be $600,000,000 short of paying for our ordinary, routine, everyday expenses, including the revenues to be derived from the new tax bill, without a penny going for national defense. If we had had this new tax bill providing a billion dollars a year for each of the past 10 years, even with it, we would not have raised sufficient money to pay for the civil expenditures of the Government without a dollar going to the Army or the Navy.

As Senators will notice, in this column [indicating] are shown the revenues for the past 10 years. Senators will notice in this column [indicating] the expenditures for the civil and miscellaneous branches of the Government. The figures demonstrate that we have not raised sufficient money even to pay for these expenditures, including none for the Army, none for the Navy, no interest on the public debt and no expenditures for veterans, Indians, or postal deficiencies, but only the ordinary expenditures after taking out those for the Army, the Navy, the postal deficiencies, interest on the public debt, and for veterans and Indians.

Here [indicating] are the receipts and for 5 of the 10 years the revenues have not even been sufficient to pay for the expenditures merely for that little group of departments and bureaus that have nothing at all to do with the Army, the Navy, pensions, veterans, postal deficiencies, and interest on the public debt. Yet it was only the other day that we were talking about giving dictatorial powers to the President; it was only the other day that we amended the Monroe Doctrine; it was only the other day that we passed three or four billion dollars for national defense; it was only last night that the President of the United States said that some form of compulsory military training would be necessary; it was only the other day that Senators on this floor said we had to have fifty or a hundred thousand planes; it was only the other day that the Senator from Oklahoma asked for all aid possible to the Allies; and every day on this floor we are confronted with the fact that we are facing a serious emergency. What is the picture? It is suggested that we shall go home without even providing sufficient money to pay for the everyday routine expenses of the Government, let alone providing a cent for the Army or the Navy. Even with this tax bill enacted, we will be $600,000,000 a year short of providing enough money for the other departments to function, without a cent going to the Army and Navy. Yet we are in the middle of an emergency.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I apologize to the Senator for interrupting him.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am glad to have the interruption.

Mr. KING. I did not quite understand the statement of the Senator that we had amended the Monroe Doctrine. My understanding is that we did not amend it; we merely reaffirmed it.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think perhaps that is a more accurate presentation of the picture; but we reaffirmed it because we were in a national emergency.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. I will yield to the Senator in a moment. What do you think, Mr. President, of a great democratic government, the largest in the world, the richest in the world, the one with the most abundant resources in the world, that in a great national emergency when war draws near, when aid is being extended within certain limits to some of the belligerent nations, when proposals to give the President dictatorial powers are promulgated, when it is said we must have fifty to a hundred thousand airplanes, when we are tripling the size of our fleet, or getting ready to triple it, cannot even raise enough money to pay for its ordinary routine expenses without a dollar going to the Army and Navy? Do you think that a party or an administration can go before the country if these facts are known and hope to be sustained? If it can be sustained in the face of these facts, in my judgment, all our efforts are futile, for democracy is gone. We are doing exactly what they did in England and France. They wait until an emergency strikes them flat in the face and then are unprepared to cope with it. That is what England and France did as to defense; that is what we did as to defense, only we had more time; and that is exactly what we are doing now as to financial defense. The people of this country are perfectly willing, in my judgment, to pay taxes sufficient, at least, to pay for the ordinary routine expenditures of the Government without a dollar going to the Army and Navy. I do not believe the people of this country expect that in this emergency there will not be some additional costs, and they are willing to assume those additional costs, if they are reasonable and equitable, and we cannot effect the savings here, as a measure securing for themselves additional safety and protection.

I now yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. Comments which have been made and the discussion which has taken place during the debate would seem to indicate misapprehension concerning the attitude of a number of Senators on this question. I should like to vote for a positive, definite, legislative reduction in governmental expenditures. I am perfectly willing to vote for 4 percent, 5 percent, or 10 percent reduction. I am not happy, however, about the form of this amendment or those which preceded it, which merely provided for a reduction up to a certain amount, leaving it not to Congress but to the Executive to bring about the reduction.

As I understand the Senator's amendment, there is no limit put as to the amount of reduction that might be imposed upon any particular appropriaton. What some of us are uneasy about is that the Executive, in all good faith, might not desire to economize in one place but would be quite willing to economize a hundred percent in some other place. Congress, having set aside these various appropriations, and having fixed the amounts, it is proposed to turn the duty over to the Executive and practically to give him a veto power on items in appropriation bills. I was wondering whether or not it would be possible to devise a practicable amendment which would absolutely indicate the items as to which Congress would require the cut to be made.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator's ground is well taken, and I share his reluctance with respect to economies, even in the way I have suggested, but I believe economies now are more important than mere forms, and, while I would prefer the form suggested by the Senator from Colorado, rather than have no economies at all, if this amendment is defeated I intend to take the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming and make it 5 percent and see if the Congress will authorize the Committee on Appropriations of both Houses to effect the saving of $250,000,000 in place of $500,000,000 which was just voted down.

Mr. ADAMS. It is somewhat more than a form; it is a matter of substance.

Mr. TYDINGS. Absolutely.

Mr. ADAMS. There might be a project in the State of South Carolina, or Wisconsin, or Louisiana, very much desired by the State and of great importance, but which, on the other hand, the President did not favor and for which he had not submitted a Budget estimate, and he might decide to take 100 percent off that project and make a saving there, and leave to the others the full amount appropriated.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. OVERTON. In line with the suggestion made by the Senator from Colorado, the Senator from Maryland will recall that yesterday I proposed an amendment to what is known as the Byrd amendment, limiting the reduction on any particular appropriation item to 25 percent. The objection was made—and by reason of that objection, mainly, if not altogether, the amendment was defeated—that since the President was instructed to make a total reduction of 10 percent in the non-military items he might find it impossible to effectuate such a reduction if he were restricted to a reduction of not in excess of 25 percent on any one appropriation item. Now, however, the substitute amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland presents a different picture.

Mr. TYDINGS. I see what the Senator is driving at. I should be glad to have an alteration in my amendment along the lines the Senator suggests limiting the cut in any one department to not more than 25 percent; because now, with only a 5-percent reduction, that bottom would not be too stringent in order to fit it into the general scheme of economy; whereas before it might not have been possible to save $500,000,000, when the proposal was on a 10-percent-cut basis, if a 25-percent limitation of cut had been fixed in the original amendment of the Senator from Virginia. So if the Senator will go to the desk and put in those words, I shall be glad to accept them as a part of my original amendment.

Mr. OVERTON. Suppose I read them now into the RECORD. I have them before me.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator will do that, I shall be glad to accept the modification.

Mr. OVERTON. In the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland, after the words "appropriations affected", at the conclusion of the first sentence, insert a colon and the following:

Provided, That in no case shall any appropriation item contained in any act appropriating money for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, be reduced by more than 25 percent.

Will the Senator from Maryland accept that modification?

Mr. TYDINGS. I accept it, because I think it would be perfectly possible to accomplish the desired result without going any further than 25 percent in any one department, and I know that that would be more in line with what I believe a great many Senators desire to bring about. I accept the modification.

Mr. President, there is no point in my talking here to a few Senators. There are only 19 who are in their seats. So we are in the midst of a great emergency. We are $600,000,000 short of providing for the ordinary, routine expenditures of the Government without a cent going for the Army or Navy, as the majority have said over and over again that they do not want any economy. When we have exhausted that road I have several amendments to raise additional taxes, and I imagine that the same ones who want no economy will likewise vote against increases in taxation which might have been avoided if we had effected economy in whole or in part.

So the truth is that here in a great emergency, with the world on fire, with war out on the horizon, we are told, with thousands of planes demanded, with the Navy to be built up bigger than ever, with universal military training in the offing, and suggested in modified form, our way of taking care of this great emergency, which many say may ultimately involve us in war, is not even to pay for the ordinary, everyday, routine civil expenditures of the Government, without a cent going for Army and Navy.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. How democracy can survive with that type of government I do not know. How it can hope to cope with the emergency I do not know. With the signposts of France and England on the roadway to tomorrow for all who wish to run to read, we are bound, even determined, to walk the same roadway that they have walked to avoid facing a little bit of hostile criticism, to avoid taking the hard but the safe road to security; and all of this in the name of democracy.

I now yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator ought to complain about the absence of several of the Senators, because in the preface of his remarks he stated that many of us had heard this speech several times.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. BROWN. So possibly those who are not here have left for that reason. I have been interested right along in what the Senator has had to say, however.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator has heard this speech several times, and I take off my hat to him for his patience and tolerance in remaining.

Mr. BROWN. I have sat here and voted with the Senator from Maryland; but, if he will permit it, I should like to call attention to this matter:

I assume that the Senator is going to support this tax bill and vote for it——

Mr. TYDINGS. That is my present intention.

Mr. BROWN. Because it is a step toward bringing the expenditures and the receipts of the Government closer together. I do not want the Senator to think this is the only tax bill we are going to have. I asked the Secretary of the Treasury during the hearings these questions, beginning on page 22:

Senator BROWN. You anticipated, when you submitted these recommendations to the committees of Congress, that there would be a further tax revision in January and February of the coming year, at the next session of Congress, did you not?

Secretary MORGENTHAU. I have every reason to believe so.

Senator BROWN. That there should be?

Secretary MORGENTHAU. Yes.

Senator BROWN. And any revision that we then make would, of course, be effective as to the income taxes that are payable March 15 and each quarter thereafter in 1941?

Secretary MORGENTHAU. Yes.

Senator BROWN. I take it, then, that the attitude of the administration is, as expressed by you, that you prefer the passage of this tax bill now, with plain notice to the country that in January and February we expect a further revision of the tax laws?

Secretary MORGENTHAU. Yes; and if somebody could give me that resolution that was passed in the House I would read it.

The CHAIRMAN. Here is the report of the committee, as I understand it.

"STUDIES OF EXCESS-PROFITS TAXES AND SPECIAL AMORTIZATION

"During the executive sessions, there have been discussed proposals to provide special amortization for national-defense industries and to provide for the imposition of excess-profits taxes. These two measures—each in itself requiring a complicated and exhaustive legislative project—must be considered together. It is the desire of this committee, which is favorably reporting a bill which will enable a larger proportion of our citizens to participate in the responsibility of providing an adequate national defense than has ever been the case before. Thus there shall not be an opportunity for the creation of new war millionaires nor further substantial enrichment of already wealthy persons because of the rearmament program. Accordingly we have instructed our technical assistants and the appropriate Treasury officials to accelerate their work in these two fields so that bills will be prepared for submission not later than the opening of the next session of Congress, which if passed by the Congress may become retroactive and apply to income earned during the calendar year of 1940, or may become effective upon any other date which Congress, in the light of information it then possesses, may deem advisable."

Senator BROWN. Is that the resolution you had in mind?

Secretary MORGENTHAU. That is the resolution I had in mind. That was the resolution that I was authorized by the President to say was not only acceptable, but pleasing to him, and he made the same statement, I understand, at his own press conference yesterday.

Senator BROWN. Well, I am in sympathy with the resolution and I think it is a good thing that it was said, but I don't think it should be interpreted to mean that either the Treasury Department or the House and Senate committees should confine themselves to those particular taxes, because there are many other avenues of revenue open that could be considered. For instance, as the members of the committee well know, I have long been interested in the question of taxing the income on State and municipal bonds and permitting the taxation of Federal bonds to the fullest extent, and cutting out all tax-exempt features. I think that should be considered.

Senator CLARK. In that connection, if the Senator will permit me, and it seems to me to be very applicable to this pronunciamento, to say that on the tax bill last year the Senator knows that I had prepared, and, as a matter of fact, was on the point of offering, an amendment to the tax bill on the very subject which the Senator from Michigan is now mentioning, and the representatives of the Ways and Means Committee came over and said, "Please don't do that this year; it will delay the consideration of this bill; it will delay adjournment; and the Ways and Means Committee is now preparing studies and will have a bill in before the end of this session."

That session ended and this session is about to end, and the bill has never come over, and it seems to me we cannot afford to postpone legislation on that promise of the Ways and Means Committee.

Senator BROWN. I joined in the effort to prevent the bond tax from being imposed in the last revenue bill, and I may say I will again join in that effort if I am reasonably well assured that that will be considered in a tax bill which will be submitted in January or February of next year, but I don't think we should confine ourselves to that tax but should consider other revenues also.

There are many other revenues. I have discussed a manufacturer's sales tax, and I understand that has been considered by the informal committee that presented this bill, and I think it should be included in any study. But my main point is this, I was much interested, as I said earlier, in the answer to the question asked by Senator CONNALLY, and I thought possibly, in view of what has been said, that your answer might be revised to some extent, and I submit that to you now.

Do you not think, Mr. Secretary, that the Treasury would be in a better position after having had the experience of the operation of this tax bill, particularly with respect to the excise part of it, to advise the Congress after 3 or 4 or 6 months as to the new taxes which should be considered in January and February?

Secretary MORGENTHAU. I don't think there is any question about that.

Senator BROWN. I take it, then, that the recommendation of the Treasury Department is that we pass this bill with an assurance to the country that the entire subject will be fully gone into by your experts between now and January, and that you will submit additional recommendations for taxes at that time?

To which the Secretary assented.

I fully agree with the Senator from Maryland that we shall have to tax much more than we propose to tax in this bill; but I think we ought to go about it carefully. I think we ought to give the Treasury an opportunity to make a full study between now and September or October, at which time we are assured by the Treasury Department that it will be in much better position than at present to submit recommendations for new taxes. The Secretary stated that he was speaking for the President and for the administration, but I want to leave with the Senator the thought that I do not think he ought to denounce this tax bill as he does, with the statement that we have brought in a tax bill that is inadequate. It is a step in the right direction. It is bringing the revenues and the expenditures of the Government a billion dollars closer together than they were before.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thank the Senator for what he says; and, of course, I never presupposed that this would be the last tax bill Congress would ever write. I am not dealing with the year 1941. I am dealing with the year 1940, and trying to call to the attention of Congress, the administration, and the country the fact that we have a big job to do, and we are not doing it. What the Senator has said applied in a military way, and I know he is in general accord with all the preparedness we can get; but let us transfer the financial preparedness for a minute to military preparedness, and while it is not a complete analysis the same thread of logic runs through it.

I remember that when the European war broke out between England and France on the one hand and Germany on the other, it was called a phony war. The winter went by, and when the springtime came I remember that General Ironsides for the British Government and General Gamelin for the French Government both said that the interim between September and spring had given them sufficient time to prepare, and that they were ready to meet the enemy. We know all about that now. That was only partial preparedness. It was not good preparedness. It was only a smattering. It was not thorough and efficient. When the Germans prepared, they thoroughly prepared their military and naval and air machine insofar as they could. The Allies thought that a little preparation would be sufficient, and today the contrast between those two types of preparation is written in the misery, and the blood, and the loss of territory, the loss of liberty, and the loss of treasure all over France and all over Great Britain.

I am one of those who do not want to say on this floor that I believe that either Mr. Hitler or Mr. Mussolini has any designs on the United States. They may have; I do not know. They may not have; I do not know. I certainly feel that our job here is to put this country in a state of complete and adequate defense, in case they have. If they have not, so much the better, but if they have, we should be ready to meet them.

One of the component parts of putting this country in an adequate state of defense is to build up our financial defenses. We have left them down for 10 long years. If this were a picture of something a year or two old, what the Senator from Michigan says would be more in point, but this has been the condition of the Treasury since June 30, 1930. Two billion seven hundred million dollars a year more has been spent than we took in, $1,100,000,000 a year as the cost of the Army and the Navy, leaving $1,600,000,000 a year needed in new revenue before any of the yearly cost of past, present, or future defense is paid for.

Now, let us see what that means in terms of human misery and suffering, welfare, if you please, humanitarianism. Only yesterday I attempted to point out that of the approximately $6,000,000,000 a year of present current revenue which the national Government receives it gets $2,500,000,000 from the corporations and the income-tax payers of the Nation. Two billion five hundred million dollars is all our Government gets from all the income-tax payers, rich and poor, and all the corporations, large and small.

Where do we get the other $3,500,000,000 a year? We get it from the great masses of the people, the poor people of the country. They are paying nearly 60 percent of all the money we obtain with which to run this Government, and the wealthy, the powerful, and the big corporations, together, even when we take 80 percent of all they earn, produce only about $2,500,000,000 for the Government.

How much more can we get from the well-to-do and the corporate interests of the country to meet the deficit? I stated a few days ago that if we took every dollar from every person in the United States who had an income of $100,000 a year or more, we would have only $960,000,000, just about 10 percent of what we spent last year and are to spend the coming year. We are already taking the vast majority of all that $960,000,000 collected from the wealthy people, so that there is only a small residue left where we can extract more money from the people in that class without taking it all. We are getting the majority of the money in cigarette taxes, amusement taxes, gasoline taxes, tariff taxes, and hundreds of direct and indirect taxes from the poor people of the Nation.

What does a national debt do? A national debt makes it imperative to impose still more taxes at some time or other on those who can bear them least, the poorer people of the Nation, and when the ultimate day of that sort of taxation comes it reduces the salary of every moderate-salaried and poorly salaried person in the United States, because it takes more from what they earn and leaves them less with which to sustain themselves and their families.

Postponed taxation, deficits, and increasing debt are the surest road to reduced wages, diminished consuming power, and lowered standards of living.

What we are coming to is not the situation which I have described for the past 10 years, but we are coming to such a condition that that will look like a mild May morning compared with the prospect for the immediate future. We are not going to have deficits of $2,700,000,000 a year, as we have had for the past 10 years; we are going to have deficits of $4,000,000,000, $5,000,000,000, $8,000,000,000, $10,000,000,000, and perhaps $12,000,000,000 a year. We cannot have 50,000 or 100,000 airplanes, with all the pilots, with all the mechanics necessary, we cannot build up our Navy to twice or three times its present size, and even with new taxes, have deficits as small as those with which we have been confronted. We are approaching the time when such a condition will look almost like a balanced Budget, barring accidents.

The time to pay taxes and to get taxes is when the people are in the best condition to afford them. So far as I can see, the prospects are that there is not likely to be another year in which the people will be as well able to pay additional taxes as they are now, for after the war is over, regardless of who wins it, regardless of the fact that we may stay out of it, a terrific world-wide depression is certain to ensue. With famine and disease and pestilence sweeping Europe, perhaps Asia, and perhaps Africa, in my judgment we will appropriate hundreds of millions of dollars for food and medical supplies for persons out of our own country in the emergency. But our own people will be economically stricken as well, and we will not have the opportunity, in my judgment, to obtain new taxes as easily as we could get them today.

The trouble with democracy, wonderful as it is, is that it does not prepare in time for the inevitable. That is its curse. Liberty is its blessing. In order to keep its blessing, we must eliminate its curse, which is failure to appreciate coming events and set the machinery of government so as to cushion the impact of dire and unwelcome circumstances.

Mr. President, if the amendment should be defeated—and I trust it will not be—it is my purpose to offer later some amendments, which I have worked out with the joint committee on taxation of the Congress, providing new taxes. I certainly feel that, these amendments being well considered and projected by experts, Congress either should effect a saving on the one hand, or an increase in taxation on the other, or, as I see it, we will not have met an emergency which we should meet before Congress adjourns.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland, as modified, in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the committee, as amended.

Mr. BARKLEY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. TYDINGS. I ask for the yeas and nays. I hope Senators will give me a vote on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHANDLER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], who, I am advised, would vote "nay," and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. I am informed that if present he would vote "yea." If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MCKELLAR. My colleague [Mr. STEWART] is unavoidably detained. He has a pair with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. HOLMAN]. I am advised that if present and voting he would vote "nay."

Mr. BANKHEAD. I announce that my colleague [Mr. HILL] is necessarily absent from the Senate on official business. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE], the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. LUNDEEN], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HUGHES], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SLATTERY], and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are necessarily detained.

Mr. AUSTIN. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. HOLMAN] is paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. STEWART]. The Senator from Oregon would vote "yea" if present.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SLATTERY]. The Senator from Vermont would vote "yea" if present.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. THOMAS] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY] are absent on official business. I am advised that if the Senator from New Hampshire were present he would vote "yea."

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] is absent because of illness in his family.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] is necessarily absent.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] is absent on official duties.

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 41, as follows:

So, Mr. TYDINGS' amendment, as modified, in the nature of a substitute for the committee amendment, as amended, was rejected.

AMENDMENT OF SOIL CONSERVATION AND DOMESTIC ALLOTMENT ACT—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. BANKHEAD submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9594) to amend section 12 (b) of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act, as amended, by authorizing the transfer of funds to cover advances for crop insurance, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 8, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Strike out "to make grants of aid" in such amendment and insert in lieu thereof "to make advances"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the title of the bill.

J. H. BANKHEAD,
CARL A. HATCH,
ALEXANDER WILEY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

MARVIN JONES,
H. P. FULMER,
WALL DOXEY,
CLIFFORD R. HOPE,
J. ROLAND KINZER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the Senate made certain amendments to the House bill. The House has agreed to the Senate amendments, with one verbal change. I move the adoption of the conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the conference report? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the report.

The report was agreed to.

REVENUE BILL OF 1940

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10039) to provide for the expenses of national preparedness by raising revenue and issuing bonds, to provide a method for paying for such bonds, and for other purposes.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I call up an amendment which has been lying on the table and ask that it be stated.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the committee amendment, as amended, is still pending. It ought to be disposed of before any other amendment is taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 33, as amended.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] yesterday completely nullified the purpose of the amendment proposed by the committee. The President now has all the authority the amendment would confer on him. He now has the authority to withhold appropriations, and therefore the amendment is a useless gesture. In the interest of sincerity and frankness I ask unanimous consent that section 403 be deleted from the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I object. Let the Senate pass upon the committee amendment in the regular way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BYRD. I ask that the committee amendment be voted down.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. As I understand, this vote is on the committee amendment known as the Byrd amendment as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, as amended. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHANDLER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS]. I do not know how he would vote. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I am informed that the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], if he were present and voting, would vote as I shall vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HUGHES], the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. LUNDEEN], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY], the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SLATTERY] are necessarily detained.

Mr. McKELLAR. My colleague [Mr. STEWART] is unavoidably detained. He has a pair with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. AUSTIN. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] is absent on official duties.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] is necessarily absent.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SLATTERY].

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. HOLMAN] is paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. STEWART].

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] is absent because of illness in his family, and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. THOMAS] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY] are absent on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 63, as follows:

So the committee amendment, as amended, was rejected.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DANAHER. Does that complete the committee amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That completes the committee amendments. The bill is still before the Senate and open to further amendment.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I offer an amendment which has been lying on the table, and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the proper place in the bill it is proposed to insert the following:

Section 205 of an act entitled "An act relating to the taxation of the compensation of public officers and employees", approved April 12, 1939, is hereby amended by adding thereto a new paragraph to read as follows:

"(b) Compensation provided by the United States to be paid as income, whether directly or indirectly, to State employees engaged in the administration of the Social Security Act, approved August 14, 1935 (49 Stat. 620), shall not be subject to retroactive taxation for the years 1936, 1937, and 1938 and prior years."

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, when the Public Salary Taxing Act was passed in 1939, consequent upon a series of decisions enunciated by the Supreme Court in that year, steps were taken to relieve from retroactive taxation salaries paid to State employees which up to that time had been considered exempt from taxation. However, Mr. President, many employees of the States whose compensation is derived either in whole or in part from funds provided by the United States Government for the administration of the Social Security Act found, due to a ruling of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that they were not comprehended within the intent and purport of the statute which the Congress passed. The net result is that thousands of employees of the States throughout the country now engaged in the enforcement of the Unemployment Compensation Act, and others under the Social Security Act, are being asked to pay retroactively taxation on salaries earned by them in the years 1936, 1937, 1938, plus a penalty of 25 percent, plus interest at 6 percent.

Mr. President, those employees have no objection whatever to being included, as are any other employees from now on, in the liability for income-tax payments; but it certainly comes as a most undue hardship on those employees, whose salaries have been obligated throughout the years, to find at this late date that they are the victims of retroactive taxation.

Insofar as the language in our statute of last year failed to include that type of employee, I submit that we failed in so much of our intendment and so much of our purpose as to negate entirely the sense of fairness with which we should approach such a situation.

There is no reason in the world why one group of employees should be subjected to retroactive taxation and no other group be held liable for such an imposition. There is no reason, on the other hand, why for salaries earned in the year 1939 they should not be held, as are all other employees, for income tax in the year 1940. To that end they have filed their returns, are paying their taxes, and from now on will be held liable, as are all other employees, for such taxes.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I ask the Senator what his construction is of the first phrase of the proposed addition to the act of April 12, 1939:

Compensation provided by the United States to be paid * * * to State employees.

Does the United States fix the amount of compensation paid to State employees and does the United States pay the compensation?

Mr. DANAHER. No; but let me say to the Senator that his question goes right to the very root of the problem, for, as the United States Treasury covers into the treasury of the State the appropriation allotted to the State for execution and administration of unemployment compensation and other similar phases of the Social Security Act within the State, there is no segregation of the amount, let me say to the Senator, for individual employees or for any number of them. Consequently such employees have always been considered to be State employees since, theoretically, they were being paid out of State funds which emanated from the State treasury and were paid to the specific employees as salary and compensation as such employees, but the reservoir, so to speak, upon which the State treasury drew was the United States Treasury, even though the funds were not earmarked for specific employees. Consequently in 1934 the Commissioner of Internal Revenue held that if the compensation of the State employee was paid wholly or in part, directly or indirectly, from Federal funds such part was taxable.

However, the General Counsel of the Treasury Department in 1937 issued a ruling to the effect, since those particular funds could not be earmarked, and could not be traced, that it could not be said that the individual employee actually got his money from the Federal Treasury.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The point to which I should like to call the attention of the Senator is that under the language of his amendment it may be doubtful whether the State employees he desires to protect will receive any protection, because his amendment applies only to "compensation provided by the United States to be paid" to State employees. I think what the Senator's desire to provide for is the case of compensation paid as income to State employees from Federal appropriations.

Mr. DANAHER. I think that is a correct statement; but I also think that the language before us in lines 5 and 6 will cover it. If the Senator has any misapprehension on that point, I will most certainly and gladly welcome any assistance from his splendid legal mind to make certain that there shall be no liability by way of retroactive taxation against State employees.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. May I say that when the amendment before us refers specifically to "compensation provided by the United States to be paid," it means only such compensation as the United States, by some legislative or administrative act, requires to be paid, and I do not think that is the case with respect to the employees the Senator is trying to protect.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. DANAHER. I will yield in a moment. Let me say to the Senator from Wyoming that because of the fact that the Commissioner had ruled that since the moneys hitherto were coming out of the State treasury, there was not any exemption now from retroactive taxation, I tried to make certain that the money that was provided by the United States to be paid as compensation, and hence as income, to the individual would be held tax-free, at least, so far as retroactive taxation is concerned, not otherwise. That is all I sought to do and hoped that I had done.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It is very difficult, of course, upon the floor of the Senate to draft technical language; but, as I indicated a moment ago, I think the actual situation is that the Senator wants to reach salaries which are paid by the State out of funds appropriated by the Federal Government for the Social Security Act, and I am afraid his amendment does not say that.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator for his thought and his assistance, and I welcome his cooperation. I now yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I wish to inquire whether the Senator's amendment is sufficiently comprehensive? It only deals with employees of the States working under the Social Security Act. Are there not other State employees upon which the tax might be retroactive unless there is a more comprehensive provision?

Mr. DANAHER. Let me answer the Senator from Kentucky in this way by reading, first, section 205 of the act of April 12, 1939, an amendment to which I am now seeking. Section 205 reads:

Compensation shall not be considered as compensation within the meaning of sections 201, 202, and 203, to the extent that it is paid directly or indirectly by the United States or any agency or instrumentality thereof.

When we put that last year in what is known as the Public Salary Taxing Act, sections 201, 202, and 203, referred to the protection against retroactive taxation of State employees, and apparently at that time it was felt that that language was sufficiently broad to cover all other classes. In any case let me say to the Senator from Kentucky I know of no other class at the moment which is affected.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DANAHER. I gladly yield.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to say to the Senator from Kentucky that, as he may recall, I handled the Public Salary Tax Act in the Senate, and it was never our intention to exempt from retroactive taxation the class of employees to which the Senator from Connecticut is referring. It was not retroactive taxation then. Since 1934 the Treasury has ruled that this class of employees were taxable.

I am in opposition to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut; I do not think it should be adopted. Certainly, as the Senator from Kentucky intimated, if we are going to take this action with regard to social-security employees, we ought to do it as to all that class of employees; but I do not think we should exempt them at all. They should have paid the tax all these years.

Mr. BARKLEY. I was raising the question the Senator has raised, that if we are to do it for this class of employees, who are appointed by the State and paid in part by the State and in part by the Federal Government, and some of them altogether by money out of the Treasury of the United States, it should be done with respect to all other employees appointed by the State and paid either out of State or paid out of Federal money.

I am not advocating this amendment. I was simply inquiring whether it sets up a special class and exempts them, whereas others who are public officials in the States are not exempted.

Mr. BROWN. None of them should be exempted.

Mr. DANAHER. Let me point out to the Senator from Kentucky that the State employees in his own State and in my State were excepted from retroactive taxation after the decision in the case of Gregory against O'Keefe in 1939. They never were held answerable for income tax until the United States Government——

Mr. MILLER and Mr. GEORGE addressed the Chair.

Mr. DANAHER. I will yield in a moment when I complete this thought. The United States Government never attempted to levy a tax upon the income of such employees. Then, when by the act we passed we attempted to protect them against retroactive liability which had been asserted as the result of the Supreme Court's decision, we did give them that protection; we did not give protection to the class of employees engaged in administering the Social Security Act.

I now yield to the Senator from Arkansas, if the Senator from Georgia will pardon me.

Mr. MILLER. I agree with the Senator from Kentucky that this amendment is not sufficiently broad to reach all the classes which have been affected and which are required to pay this retroactive tax. If the Senator will pardon me, I will state the situation which exists in Arkansas.

The employees in the welfare department, in the social security and the other departments, although State employees, their salaries being paid in whole or in part by Federal funds, have paid a State income tax for those years on the theory that their salaries were paid from State funds. In fact, the attorney general of Arkansas answered an inquiry from one of the employees and advised him that, notwithstanding the funds were supplied by the Federal Government, when they went into the State treasury they lost their identity as Federal funds and became State funds, and therefore, under the State law, they were subject to a State income tax, but not subject to a Federal income tax. So, unless this amendment is adopted, those persons will be discriminated against to the extent of the Federal taxes that they are required to pay for 1936, 1937, and 1938, because they have paid a State income tax on the funds, thinking they were State funds.

Mr. DANAHER. Let me say to the Senator from Arkansas that under the present ruling they will also pay a Federal tax for the very same years.

Mr. MILLER. That is what I say. They will be discriminated against to that extent for those 3 years.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. MILLER. If the Senator will yield further——

Mr. DANAHER. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. I think the Senator's amendment does not go far enough, because it deals only with employees under the Social Security Act, whereas persons appointed in the same way are employed under the various other welfare acts. They are even employed under the W. P. A. and other agencies.

Mr. DANAHER. Let me say to the Senator from Arkansas that so long as we agree on the principle of this thing—that we should not tax retroactively the income of State employees—I am perfectly willing to include others, if there be other classes than those enumerated in the amendment I propose. My point was directed to this particular class for the reason that I knew that in Connecticut, my State, there are over 250 persons in the unemployment compensation division alone who are being seriously affected by the demands issued this month by the collector, requiring 3 years' back tax, 25-percent penalty, and 6-percent interest. I am perfectly willing that the amendment be broadened to include all those who properly should be included.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I do.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator from Michigan was correct in his statement that the committee which handled that particular legislation—and I happened to be a member of the committee, of which the Senator was chairman—did not intend to relieve of taxes anybody who had not paid taxes; but the equity of the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut is that these employees have paid taxes under the State Income Tax Act that they would not have had to pay to the State, but would have had to pay to the Federal Government, if they were Federal funds, as has now been held.

Mr. DANAHER. That is the fact.

I now yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the fact that to the extent that the salary of the so-called State employee was paid out of Federal funds, the public salary act is wholly ineffective. The Federal Government has always had authority to tax and power to tax so much of the salary as was paid by the Federal Government, on the same theory that those in the legislative branch have paid income-taxes on their salaries. The Senator's amendment would relieve them of all taxes. It would relieve them of income-taxes assessed against that part of the salary paid by the State as well as that part of the salary paid by the Federal Government; and since 1935, at least, there should have been no doubt that the salary paid by the Federal Government was subject to the income tax.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Georgia, because of his last reference, that I was seeking to reach that very point from the Senator from Wyoming, who had a question a few minutes since, as the Senator from Georgia may have noticed. I sought to reach it by saying, in line 5, that the compensation provided by the United States to be paid as income shall not be subject to retroactive taxation.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator's amendment is limited, then, to that portion of the tax paid. I call the Senator's attention, however, to what has been suggested by other Senators—that there are many other so-called State employees who receive their compensation in whole or in part out of funds provided by the Federal Government. That is true even of the National Guard. It is true of the teachers of vocational education. It is true of many of the teachers in the land-grant colleges. It is true of the general welfare workers. It would hardly be fair to relieve one group—that is, those who are administering the social security law—and leave the burden resting on the others.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, as I said to the Senator from Arkansas, I certainly am not trying to limit this amendment to one narrow class. Quite the contrary; I am simply trying to achieve what seems to me to be the sheer equity of the situation, that nobody who properly should have received exemption, except for the Supreme Court decision of last January, should now be subjected to a retroactive tax.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

Mr. DANAHER. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I desire to say to the Senator from Connecticut that I have to go to a meeting of the Committee on Naval Affairs; and I should like to know if it would divert him if I should ask the chairman of the Finance Committee a question, which will take only about a minute?

Mr. DANAHER. Indeed not. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the chairman of the Finance Committee, in charge of this bill, is anxious to get it through. I have pending several amendments which I should like to have voted on; but in view of what happened here this afternoon, I fear that it would probably only be a waste of effort. In the event those amendments are not offered on the floor this afternoon, I ask the Senator from Mississippi when he feels that the Committee on Finance or the Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation or the Committee on Ways and Means is likely to meet, so that the amendments could be considered in line with new taxes to be raised in addition to those included in the pending bill?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not know that I can give the Senator any definite information about the matter. It is presumed that if circumstances justify it or necessitate it, we may have to raise much more revenue by taxes. It has been a mooted question whether or not there would be an adjournment on Saturday night. At present it seems that there is likely to be a recess for several weeks. I do not know whether or not definite plans have been made in regard to the matter; but it seems to me that if the circumstances justify it—and events now tend in that direction—the Ways and Means Committee will begin the consideration of these questions, which are somewhat urgent.

Mr. TYDINGS. At this session?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; at this session; because if we recess, the session will probably be a prolonged one. Anyway, I think at the first opportunity they will go into the subject. The Finance Committee, I am sure, will cooperate right along that line.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then I take it that it is the Senator's opinion that in the event the Congress does not adjourn next Saturday, but takes a recess instead, it is the present probability that the Committee on Ways and Means of the House will immediately start hearings and the consideration of additional taxes?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I think we are going to start right away. I hope so, because there are one or two questions that must be settled by Congress. No one wants to see any war millionaires made through the legislation we pass; and there may have to be an excess-profits tax, but it should be very carefully studied. All the experts should be at work on it; and I have been advised by the Treasury that it would be at least 2 months before a well-written excess-profits tax law could be framed, free of loopholes, and at the same time fair, and one that would bring in more revenue. So I think that is one of the propositions we shall have to start considering, because I want to bring it back to Congress and have it passed as quickly as possible.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thank the Senator for what he has said. Of course, when I first attempted to have adopted some amendments looking toward economy and additional taxation, they were predicated upon the thought that Congress would probably adjourn and go home, and that we would not have any new tax legislation until after January. Now it begins to appear that the probabilities are that the Ways and Means Committee of the House will immediately go into this tax question again without waiting for January, as soon as the pending tax bill is out of the way. While there is nothing definite about that situation, with the Senator's assurance of his position, and the probabilities as they are, I am inclined to let the matter stand as it is, believing that it would be futile anyway to try at this time to have amendments adopted to the bill, in view of the happenings of the last 4 or 5 days. I will take the amendments before the Ways and Means Committee and the Finance Committee, in the hope that if they meet immediately the amendments may be enacted and furnish some additional revenue.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the Senator will take that course.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. BYRD. I am very much encouraged by what the Senator from Mississippi, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, has said—that some hearings will be begun on tax legislation—because I, for one, think the pending bill is totally inadequate to meet the emergency. Like the Senator from Maryland, I also have an amendment which I intend to offer to make the collection of taxes retroactive on incomes earned in 1939; but with the assurance from the Senator from Mississippi that early meetings of the Finance Committee will be held, I shall withhold the amendment.

I wish to impress upon the Senate and upon the Senator from Mississippi the urgency and the necessity of passing additional tax legislation at the earliest possible time.

Mr. HARRISON. A war-profits tax may be proposed. If we get into war, we must have a war-profits tax. Otherwise we must have an excess-profits tax applied to those who are dealing in things necessary for use in war. But such taxes must be studied very carefully, and I am very hopeful that the Ways and Means Committee, if they desire, will work with the Committee on Finance; otherwise we will work separately. The aides and experts of the Treasury Department are all working along that line now. I do not think there is any doubt that further taxes must be raised, as has been pointed out by different Senators, including the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Maryland, and we are going to use a spyglass in order to try to find some additional sources of taxation——

Mr. BROWN. A microscope.

Mr. HARRISON. A microscope—with the least burden to the people. I hope the Senator will send to the committee his amendment to make the taxes retroactive. We had to turn it down after some study because we felt it would be better to tax incomes earned in the coming years rather than those earned in the years which have passed.

Mr. BYRD. Does the Senator think that within the next 30 days the consideration of a new tax measure will be begun?

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, that is up to the Ways and Means Committee, but I will say that if Congress is to remain here, if it is not to adjourn—and I do not thing there is any possibility of adjournment now—I shall use every influence I have, if I have any, to get the matter started immediately.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I should like to observe that I think the Senator used a very good expression when he said he would be looking through a spyglass. I think he will need one if he sights a tax bill before next spring.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope we may at least reach a very fair conclusion on the matter, and that we will have as little trouble as we have had during the consideration of the pending bill. I trust that Senators will continue their fine spirit of cooperation, and that before 6 o'clock this evening we may pass the bill.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

TAXATION AND CAPITAL INVESTMENT

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I merely want to say another word apropos of the discussion which has just now taken place.

I could not help being impressed by the expression of the chairman of the Finance Committee and others that a microscope may be needed to discern profits and a spyglass to discover an effective tax bill. I am very much afraid that in the preparation of our tax bills we have given too little consideration to the fact that profits are the basis of all taxes and that there can be no revenue unless there first are earnings.

I hope that the Finance Committee here and the Ways and Means Committee in the House will give consideration to methods of taxation which will stimulate employment, because if we do not succeed in stimulating employment, we shall continue to be obliged to make deficit appropriation for made work under P. W. A., we shall have to continue to make deficit appropriations to provide parity payments for farmers and we shall find no release from accumulating national debt.

Mr. President, it must be clear to everyone that all taxation proceeds from the earnings of the people, and the earnings of the people are to be obtained only in productive enterprise. It seems to me the primary responsibility on those of us who are giving thought to taxation will be to stimulate productive enterprise and to stimulate employment, so that there will be some profits upon which taxes can be levied.

Therefore, Mr. President, it will be my purpose to appear before the committee at the proper time, if I can, and urge some form of incentive taxation, by which I mean rates and rewards that will encourage capital investment so that private industry may afford new opportunities for employment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What kind of taxes do stimulate business? I have been interested in tax bills all my public life, and that is the kind of taxation about which I have never heard. I should like to be informed of a tax like that.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator was good enough, on the floor of the Senate only a few weeks ago, to indicate his approval of a suggestion which I made at that time in the form of a bill which was designed to reduce the burden of taxation on those whose expenditures had the effect of creating jobs. Of course, technically speaking, the Senator is quite right; taxes do not stimulate production or profits, but taxes do handicap production, and handicaps can be removed by a wise tax policy. Let me say to the Senator that what I mean is that we should so draft tax bills as to provide an incentive to those who have capital to invest, in order to induce them to do so. I believe that by extending rewards to those who employ workers we shall be able to use taxes for the purpose of stimulating profits and thereby increasing revenue.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, if the Senator from Connecticut will yield further, if the Senator from Wyoming is referring to his bill taxing labor-saving machinery, I was inclined to be favorable to that, not on the ground that it would stimulate business but on the ground that it would supply means in an equitable way for handling the unemployment situation.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The bill was not a tax on machinery. Let me make that clear. It contained a tax on earnings, to be sure, but its most important feature was a credit for the employment of people.

Mr. McNARY. I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is demanded. The Senator from Connecticut has the floor.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, let me remark to Senators that last winter, when this situation was first called to my attention, I took the matter up with the genial chairman of the Committee on Finance, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], who cooperated with me to the fullest, and in turn took up the situation with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Our correspondence and memoranda on this subject were mutually made available, to the end that a study and canvass of the situation could be achieved.

It is true that I was interested particularly, as the language of my amendment indicates, in employees engaged in the administration of the Social Security Act. The discussion this afternoon has tended to indicate that there are other fields and other phases which should be covered by the language of the proposed amendment. During the interim while the colloquy between the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Mississippi was proceeding, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] advised me that he had submitted to various Senators language which he thinks adequate, and which they have agreed is designed to include all the elements and all employees who, in my opinion, should be included.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. I wish to offer a substitute amendment at this time, which I send to the desk to be read. Commenting on it, I may state that at one time previously I offered this amendment, and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] at that time stated that he would give sympathetic consideration to it. Now that the discussion has reached the point it has reached, when we all realize that much injustice would be done if the amendment were not agreed to, I ask that it be read and that the Senate give consideration to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the proper place the following:

Section 205 of the Public Salary Tax Act of 1939 is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 205. No amount of income tax (including interest, additions to tax, and additional amounts) shall be collected after April 12, 1939, for any taxable year beginning prior to January 1, 1939, to the extent attributable to compensation for personal services as an officer or employee of a State, or any political subdivision thereof, or any agency or instrumentality of any one or more of the foregoing. As used in this section the term 'compensation' means compensation paid directly or indirectly by the United States or any agency or instrumentality thereof."

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, as has been stated, there are others outside the Social Security Administration who are interested. Every land-grant college is interested. There are also payments made by the Government to militia, or the National Guard, and there are a number of other payments which go to highway sections of the States. So it has been felt that the thing to do was to make it broad enough to cover all those cases, not simply the Social Security cases, as suggested by the Senator from Connecticut.

I submitted this amendment to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] a few moments ago, and the expert now sitting next to the Senator helped to draft it. As I understand, it meets the general situation 100 percent.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] the chairman of the Finance Committee, has asked me to express my views in regard to this amendment. As I stated to the Senator from Kentucky a while ago the special committee, of which I was chairman, had charge of the Public Salary Tax Act. I think I may safely say that with the representatives of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, the Treasury Department, and the Attorney General's office and the Ways and Means Committee, we drafted the Public Salary Tax Act. At the time it was adopted it was understood that because of the cases to which the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER] has referred—the O'Keefe and Gerhart cases particularly—there was a certain class of State employees who had legally always been subject to the Federal income tax. The Treasury as early as 1935 had issued a ruling that a certain class of State employees was subject to the income tax law. There is no question that the two cases brought about a situation in which legally a great many State employees—in fact all State employees—had for many years back been subject legally to the Federal income-tax law.

It was felt, therefore, by those of us who drafted the Public Salary Tax Act that all these State employees who had up to the time of these decisions assumed that they were not liable for a Federal income tax, should be relieved of that tax liability.

So we wrote into the statute a provision which exempted them from any retroactive taxation. It is somewhat of a misnomer to use the word "retroactive," because legally they had always been subject, under the Supreme Court decisions, to the income-tax law.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. Will the Senator state whether or not there was any levy under it?

Mr. BROWN. There was as to the particular class of employees to which the Senator's amendment refers. From 1935 on the Bureau of Internal Revenue had ruled that this very class of employees was subject to the Federal income-tax law.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, was it not so that the ruling was limited solely to the amount of Federal funds that could be traced into the hands of any such employee?

Mr. BROWN. Yes; and that is all that we tax now. If the Senator will be patient, I will develop that thought.

Mr. DANAHER. I beg the Senator's pardon for making the interruption.

Mr. BROWN. So, Mr. President, that act exempted all State employees from any form of Federal taxation prior to January 1, 1939. But we also provided that the class of State employees who had heretofore paid a Federal income tax on that part of their income or salary which came from the Federal Government should continue to pay it. They did pay from 1935 on. I cannot say that there was no objection to it; but it was paid.

Now, as to the point the Senator from Connecticut raises. The only income tax that was levied prior to January 1, 1939, when the public-salary tax became effective, was as to that portion of the salary that was contributed by the Federal Government. The Senator from Connecticut has paid a tax on his Federal salary ever since he has been here. So has every other Senator, and so has every other Federal employee who received an income which was subject to taxation.

As I have said, the Bureau of Internal Revenue ruled in 1935 that all State employees who were receiving an income from the Federal Government should be required to pay an income tax on that portion of their income which was paid by the Federal Government. That is all we did under the Public Salary Tax Act.

The Senator from Connecticut now wants to go back and say to thousands of State employees who have paid that tax that they were in error in paying it. The Government told them in 1935 that they were liable for that tax. The great majority of them, I venture to say, have paid that tax. It would certainly be unfair to that large class of State employees now to say that they were in error in paying that tax, and exempt only those who have not paid it. Those who have paid cannot now get their money back because the statute of limitations has run against them, and the Senator's amendment does not relieve them.

So I leave the proposition here with the simple statement that all we ask these people to do is to pay their Federal income tax on their Federal salaries. We do not tax them a dollar upon their State salaries until the effective date of the Public Salary Tax Act, when they pay a tax similar to that paid by all other State employees.

Mr. President, we went into this matter carefully. We explained it fully to the Senate when the Public Salary Tax Act was considered, and I see no reason why we should change the rule.

I am authorized to say that I am expressing the views of the Bureau of Internal Revenue and of the Treasury Department in opposing this amendment. So I trust that we will make no change in the law.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, in the case of Gregory against O'Keefe, decided last year, the Supreme Court held for the first time that all State employees were subject to income tax. The regulation to which the Senator refers not only was not conclusive; it was not acted upon.

These employees were never even levied against in any way. When they did not file returns they were not called upon to file returns. When the case of Gregory against O'Keefe was finally decided the levy was for the first time asserted, and on the face of that assertion we now have the demand issued by the Commissioner in November of last year that all these people shall pay taxes for the 3 years last preceding.

When section 205 of the Public Salary Tax Act was passed in 1939 it purported to make exceptions as to certain individual employees of the States of the classes referred to here. They have had no opportunity whatever to litigate whether they were or were not liable for the tax for the past 3 years. They are definitely foreclosed by virtue of the case of Gregory against O'Keefe, and consequently it is a rank injustice and a hardship on these people who after all these years are now being called upon to pay taxes and penalty and interest dating back to the tax year 1936.

Mr. President, the persons affected do not earn too much money anyhow, and at this late date to impose what in effect is a retroactive tax is a rank injustice and a hardship on them.

I am willing to accept the substitute offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] in the nature of a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER].

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I wish to refer to a situation which will show Senators the equity of my amendment. Take for instance the payments which have been made to the land grant colleges by the Federal Government. The professors of those colleges paid the taxes mentioned by the Senator from Arkansas. They paid State income taxes on their income. After 1939 they are asked, because of the decision referred to—and that was not the idea of the statute we passed—they are asked to go back and do that which we did not do when we were mere citizens of the State and not employees of the Federal Government. They are asked to pay a tax for 3 years on that portion of their salaries coming from the Federal Government. It seems to me only equitable and fair that the legislation provided in the amendment be enacted.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may have inserted in the RECORD at this point a letter which I received on the subject under discussion from the chairman of the Wisconsin Industrial Commission.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION OF WISCONSIN,
Madison, Wis., March 16, 1940.

Hon. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, Jr.,
United States Senator from Wisconsin,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR LA FOLLETTE: May I thank you on behalf of several hundred State employees for the interest which you have manifested in the matter which I brought to your attention in my wire of March 13.

We at the time had considerable doubt as to whether the matter proposed was germane to the Hatch bill, but, at least, an opportunity presented itself for bringing the matter to the attention of the Senators.

Senator WILEY likewise advised us that the corrective legislation we had in mind was not germane to the Hatch bill, but he considered it possible, and in his wire he stated that he considered it possible to attach corrective legislation as a rider to House Joint Resolution 407, which seeks to extend the reciprocal trade agreement program. We, of course, are entirely unacquainted, and would in any event fail to suggest to our Senators the most appropriate procedure for effecting a legislative correction to the problem at hand. We have full confidence that complete cooperation will be manifested in working the matter out along the best lines.

It is the purpose of this letter to set out more fully for you the subject matter of our wire. These views, observations, and considerations may be of assistance. You may deem it advisable, however, to have a much more detailed study made and presented to you to assist in carrying through corrective legislation. We would, of course, be only too glad to go into the matter from any angle you might suggest, and draw up such data and briefs as you may indicate.

It is our thought that the following comments are pertinent, and may be helpful at this time:

1. Number of employees affected: Conservatively, there are several hundred State employees in Wisconsin whose interests are, in all probability, affected by the present Federal legislation allowing assessments for past years on their income earned in State service. We cannot at this time afford you an approximately exact number. However, an enumeration of the departments affected will show the wide application of the principle at stake. The Employment Service and the Unemployment Compensation Department of the Industrial Commission have approximately 600 employees. While, of course, not all of these fall in salary brackets that would cause them to be affected by the present income-tax legislation, nevertheless there is a good proportion of this number who are affected.

The chairman of the highway commission estimates that there are approximately 200 individuals in the State highway department who may well have to pay back taxes through a considerable number of years. Many individuals on the instructional staff at the university in the schools of engineering and of agriculture are affected. The entire number of county agents and their staffs are concerned. The department of agriculture and markets have some cases involved. The department of public welfare, embodying the relief and assistance agencies, have a very considerable number of individuals affected. The employees of the department of vocational education have a stake in the matter. Employees in the department of public instruction and in the conservation department are affected.

2. Considerations relating to the equities of the situation: In all save a very few cases, such as university instructors and county agents, the State employees whose salaries are derived in whole or in part from Federal grants to the State have come from the classified civil-service lists. There is absolutely no difference in job-qualification standards and general nature of work done between employees whose salaries are traceable to Federal grants and employees whose salaries are not so traceable. State employees, regardless of whether or not their income is derived from Federal grants, not only are selected with reference to identical job-qualification standards and do the same type of work, the civil-service classification considered, but there is likewise no difference in the salary brackets; and promotions, pay increases, etc., are subject to identical considerations.

In a number of instances the State employees affected in the instant situation were already in State employment and performing the functons of their departments before the advent of Federal funds into the picture. As an example, the State of Wisconsin had an employment service and an unemployment-compensation department before the Wagner-Peyser funds and funds under title III of the Social Security Act were made available, respectively, to these two departments. The affected employees in these two departments had been selected with reference to personnel classifications set up before the coming of Federal funds. Their qualifications and salary classifications in no manner related to Federal specifications. At the time Federal funds were afforded the State there was no change in pay or salary classification of these individuals. It is quite obvious that if the Federal Government now goes back and taxes these employees, the fact that the Federal Government came in and furnished money to the State to pay the salaries of these employees means that these employees suffered what amounts to a salary waiver which is now to be made effective by one assessment for all these past years.

The employees in these departments have in very many instances been selected from classifications in the civil-service list from which many other State departments draw their personnel and hence are receiving the same rates of pay and are performing the same functions as are other State employees. Certainly, to go back now and tax this restricted group of individuals on a retroactive basis makes for discrimination and inequality between employees in this State doing the same type of work pursuant to State civil-service standards. The present attempt of the Federal Government to retroactively tax the salaries of the State employees here in question can only result in the greatest financial hardships to the individuals affected. As before stated, a highway commissioner asserted that there are approximately 200 resident engineers and inspectors whose salaries are traceable to Federal sources. He further stated that he is certain that a very large proportion of this group have a service period of 5 or 6 years or even longer, and that in some instances the affected employees have been with the department for as long as 15 years. The highway commissioner further stated that he is confident that none of the employees knew of the present situation and had never had the matter brought to their attention.

The comptroller of the university states that several individuals on the instructional staff in the colleges of engineering and agriculture are affected. He likewise states that there are approximately 70 county agents who are directly concerned in the outcome of this matter. Some of the agents have been in the service for 20 or 25 years, and it seems clear that even section 1211 of the 1926 Revenue Act would not serve to abate their liability, since the cited section did not abate liability with reference to certain classes of State employees whose salaries were derived from Federal sources. The comptroller states that this matter was never brought to the attention of the university until about 1936. Since that time names of many of the individuals affected have been furnished the Federal Government, pursuant to its request; but the comptroller is rather certain that the individuals concerned have done nothing to make up their arrears liability, which, in some instances, as pointed out, runs back a score of years.

At this time for the Federal Government to assert its taxing power in the manner proposed seems unfair and inequitable indeed. The whole transaction can be charged with grave financial consequences on the individuals affected.

3. Legal considerations: We have asked our counsel to prepare a short memorandum advising us very briefly of the status of State employees with reference to the Federal taxing power, as this status existed in the past, and, specifically, we asked to be informed as to whether State employees whose salaries have been derived from Federal grants have always been considered as subject to the Federal income-tax provisions.

It appears that your information, to the effect that State employees whose salaries have been derived from Federal grants, have always been considered subject to the Federal taxing power, is erroneous. As counsel's memorandum points out, prior to the Gearhardt and O'Keefe cases, 1938 and 1939, the basis for distinguishing between State employees who were liable to pay Federal income tax and those who were not liable, was the nature of the functions performed by the employees. If the services related to an essential function of government, the services and income derived therefrom were considered as exempt from the Federal taxing jurisdiction. If the services were associated with a nonessential governmental function, or government in its proprietary aspect, then the services and income derived therefrom were subject to the Federal taxing jurisdiction.

It is quite clear from the cases that it is this distinction between the "essential" and "nonessential" nature of services performed that controlled the matter of Federal jurisdiction prior to the above-cited cases. The source of the employees' salaries (that is, whether derived from Federal grant) had nothing to do with the matter. It is quite true that section 1211 of the 1926 Revenue Act abated the liability of certain employees, and failed to abate the liability of certain State employees whose salaries were derived from Federal grant. However, as the memorandum will show, this abating provision was concerned only with the liability of employees who were then thought to be within the taxing jurisdiction of the Federal Government; that is, employees performing nonessential governmental functions. The effect of section 1211 was to abate the liability of this group in all instances save those in which these employees performing nonessential governmental services had their salaries derived from Federal grants. The derivation of the salary from Federal sources had nothing to do in determining the liability of the group of employees affected by section 1211, and the application of the principle of derivation of salaries from Federal sources, as it is found in section 205 of the Public Salary Tax Act of 1939, has no relation whatsoever to the manner in which the principle is applied in the Revenue Act of 1926. This will be made clearer by the memorandum.

Allow us to again extend our sincere appreciation for the efforts which you are directing to correct a most inequitable situation. We offer our services, of course, for gathering any data and preparing any material which might be helpful, in your estimation.

Very truly yours,

INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION,
VOYTA WRABETZ, Chairman.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER].

Mr. DANAHER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been requested. Is the request seconded?

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. McNARY. The rule requires that one-fifth of those present shall second the request in order that it may be granted. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Donahey	Lee	Schwartz
Ashurst	Downey	Lodge	Schwellenbach
Austin	Ellender	Lucas	Sheppard
Barkley	George	Lundeen	Smathers
Bilbo	Gerry	McCarran	Smith
Bone	Gillette	McKellar	Taft
Bridges	Green	McNary	Thomas, Idaho
Brown	Guffey	Maloney	Thomas, Okla.
Bulow	Gurney	Mead	Thomas, Utah
Burke	Hale	Miller	Townsend
Byrd	Harrison	Minton	Truman
Byrnes	Hayden	Murray	Tydings
Capper	Herring	Norris	Vandenberg
Caraway	Hill	Nye	Van Nuys
Chandler	Holt	O'Mahoney	Wagner
Chavez	Hughes	Pittman	Walsh
Clark, Idaho	Johnson, Calif.	Radcliffe	Wheeler
Clark, Mo.	Johnson, Colo.	Reed	White
Connally	King	Reynolds	Wiley
Danaher	La Follette	Russell

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The question is on agreement to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], in the nature of a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER].

Mr. DANAHER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHANDLER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], who is unavoidably detained because of illness in his family. I am informed that if he were present he would vote as I shall vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). Having been in the Committee on Naval Affairs during the discussion of this amendment, I ask unanimous consent to be excused from voting, because I do not sufficiently understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator is excused from voting.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] are detained in Government departments. I am advised that if present and voting, these Senators would vote "nay."

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SLATTERY] is unavoidably detained. I am advised that if present and voting, he would vote "nay."

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Florida [Mr. ANDREWS], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH], and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] are necessarily absent.

Mr. McKELLAR. My colleague [Mr. STEWART] is necessarily absent. I am advised that if present and voting, he would vote "nay." He has a pair with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. AUSTIN. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. HOLMAN] is paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. STEWART]. The Senator from Oregon would vote "yea" if present.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] has a general pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SLATTERY]. The Senator from Vermont would vote "yea" if present.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] has a general pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS].

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY] is absent on official business.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] is absent on official duties.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] is necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 44, as follows:

YEAS—34

Austin	Gerry	McNary	Schwartz
Bridges	Gurney	Maloney	Taft
Burke	Hale	Miller	Thomas, Idaho
Capper	Hughes	Minton	Townsend
Caraway	Johnson, Calif.	Norris	Wagner

NOT VOTING—18

Andrews	Frazier	Neely	Stewart
Bailey	Gibson	Overton	Tobey
Bankhead	Glass	Pepper	Tydings
Barbour	Hatch	Shipstead
Davis	Holman	Slattery

So Mr. WILEY'S amendment in the nature of a substitute for Mr. DANAHER'S amendment was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Megill, one of its clerks, announced that the House having proceeded to reconsider the bill (H. R. 9381) to provide for the alteration of certain bridges over navigable waters of the United States, for the apportionment of the cost of such alterations between the United States and the owners of such bridges, and for other purposes, returned by the President of the United States, with his objections, to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, it was—

Resolved, That the said bill pass, two-thirds of the House of Representatives agreeing to pass the same.

REVENUE BILL OF 1940

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10039) to provide for the expenses of national preparedness by raising revenue and issuing bonds, to provide a method for paying for such bonds, and for other purposes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert the following new title:

TITLE IV

SECTION 401. Chapter 2 of the Internal Revenue Code is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subchapter:

"SUBCHAPTER E—EXCESS-PROFITS TAX BASED ON INVESTED CAPITAL

"SEC. 750. Imposition of tax.

"In addition to all other taxes there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year beginning after December 31, 1939, upon the income of every corporation a tax equal to the following percentages of the net income:

"First Bracket

"Twenty percent of the amount of the net income for the taxable year in excess of the excess-profits credit (determined under section 751) and not in excess of 20 percent of the invested capital.

"Second Bracket

"Forty percent of the amount of the net income for the taxable year in excess of 20 percent of the invested capital.

"In any case where the full amount of the excess-profits credit is not allowed under the first bracket, by reason of the fact that such credit is in excess of 20 percent of the invested capital, the part not so allowed shall be deducted from the amount in the second bracket.

"SEC. 751. Excess-profits credit.

"(a) The excess-profits credit shall consist in the case of a domestic corporation of a specific exemption of $3,000 plus an amount equal to 8 percent of the invested capital for the taxable year. A foreign corporation or a corporation entitled to the benefit of section 251 or a corporation organized under the China Trade Act, 1922, shall be entitled to an excess-profits credit of 8 percent of the invested capital.

"(b) In the case of a return made for a fractional part of a year, the specific exemption of $3,000 shall be reduced to an amount which bears the same ratio to such specific exemption as the number of months in the period for which return is made bears to 12 months.

"(c) In any case where a tax is assessed upon the basis of a consolidated return only one specific exemption of $3,000 shall be allowed.

"SEC. 752. Exempt corporations.

"(a) Corporations enumerated in section 101 shall to the extent they are exempt from the income tax under chapter I be exempt from taxation under this subchapter;

"(b) Personal service corporations as defined in section 200 (5) of the Revenue Act of 1921;

"(c) Personal holding companies as defined in subchapter A of chapter II; and

"(d) Foreign personal holding companies as defined in supplement P of chapter I.

"SEC. 753. Net income.

"For the purpose of the tax imposed by section 750, the net income shall be the same as the net income for income-tax purposes in chapter I, with the following adjustments:

"(a) Additional deductions: (1) Dividends.—There shall be allowed as a deduction the amount received as dividends from a domestic corporation which is subject to taxation under chapter I. The deduction allowed by this subsection shall not be allowed in respect of dividends received from a corporation organized under the China Trade Act of 1922, or from a corporation which under section 251 is taxable only on its gross income from sources within the United States by reason of its receiving a large percentage of its gross income from sources within a possession of the United States.

"(2) Loss in inventory: (A) At the time of filing return for the first taxable year under this subchapter a taxpayer may, notwithstanding any other provision of law, file a claim in abatement based on the fact that he has sustained a substantial loss (whether or not actually realized by sale or other disposition) resulting from any material reduction (not due to temporary fluctuation) of the value of the inventory for such taxable year, or from the actual payment after the close of such taxable year of rebates in pursuance of contracts entered into during such year upon sales made during such year. In such case payment of the amount of the tax covered by such claim shall not be required until the claim is decided, but the taxpayer shall accompany his claim with a bond in double the amount of the tax covered by the claim, with sureties satisfactory to the Commissioner, conditioned for the payment of any part of such tax found to be due, with interest. If any part of such claim is disallowed, then the remainder of the tax due shall on notice and demand by the collector be paid by the taxpayer with interest at the rate of 6 percent per annum from the time the tax would have been due had no such claim been filed. If it is shown to the satisfaction of the Commissioner that such substantial loss has been sustained, then in computing the tax imposed by this subchapter the amount of such loss shall be deducted from the net income.

"(B) If no such claim is filed, but it is shown to the satisfaction of the Commissioner that during the period of 1 year after the date upon which the first return under this subchapter is due the taxpayer has sustained a substantial loss of the character above described then the amount of such loss shall be deducted from the net income for the first taxable year under this subchapter and the tax imposed by this subchapter for such year shall be redetermined accordingly. Any amount found to be due to the taxpayer upon the basis of such redetermination shall be credited or refunded to the taxpayer in accordance with the provisions of section 322.

"(3) Amortization: (A) In the case of buildings, machinery, equipment, or other depreciable facilities, contracted for and constructed, erected, installed, or acquired on or after January 1, 1940, for the production of articles essential to the prosecution of a war, and in the case of vessels contracted for and constructed or acquired on or after such date for the transportation of articles or men essential to the prosecution of a war, there shall be allowed, for any taxable year ending after December 31, 1939, a reasonable deduction for the amortization of such part of the cost of such facilities or vessels as has been borne by the taxpayer (not in excess of the adjusted basis under section 113), but not again including any amount otherwise allowed under chapter I, or previous acts of Congress as a deduction in computing net income. The allowance under this subsection shall be inclusive of all depreciation during the amortization period on property subject to amortization: Provided, That amortization shall not be allowed under this paragraph unless the construction, erection, installation, or acquirement of the facility or vessel shall have been authorized by the President, through such agency as he shall designate, and determined by such agency to be for the production of articles essential to the prosecution of a war, or, in the case of vessels, for the transportation of articles or men essential to the prosecution of a war: Provided further, That in the case of vessels, buildings, machinery, equipment, or other facilities contracted for, or constructed, erected, or installed prior to January 1, 1940, but acquired by the taxpayer subsequent to such date, whether by purchase, exchange, gift, transfer, or in any other manner, no amortization shall be allowed under this paragraph: Provided further, That after the President shall proclaim that the need for such emergency production and transportation no longer exists this paragraph shall cease to be effective and the Commissioner may reexamine the returns made under this subchapter, and if he then finds that the deduction originally allowed was incorrect, the tax for the year or years affected shall be redetermined. The amount of the deduction under this subsection shall be allowed only with respect to such facilities or vessels which have become obsolete, or ceased to be required, or have been sold, prior to 1 year after the date of such proclamation. The amount of any deficiency in tax determined to be due may be assessed and collected at any time, subject to the provisions of chapter I, without regard to the provisions of section 275. The amount of tax overpaid, if any, shall be credited or refunded to the taxpayer in accordance with the provisions of section 322.

"(B) Tentative allowance: For the purpose of returns under this subchapter, the tentative estimate of the amount of such amortization for any year shall not exceed 12½ percent of the cost of such part of the facilities or vessels as has been borne by the taxpayer: Provided, That when the aggregate tentative allowances equal 50 percent of the cost of the facilities or vessels no further tentative allowances shall be made.

"(b) Consolidated net income: Subject to the foregoing provisions of this section and to the elimination of intercompany transactions (whether or not resulting in any profit or loss to the separate corporations), the consolidated net income shall be the combined net income of the several corporations consolidated.

"(c) Taxes: There shall be allowed as a deduction Federal income taxes paid or accrued during the taxable year.

"SEC. 754. Consolidated returns.

"(a) Requirement to file consolidated returns: Corporations which are affiliated within the meaning of this section shall, under regulations to be prescribed by the Commissioner with the approval of the Secretary, make a consolidated return of net income and invested capital for the purposes of this subchapter, and the taxes hereunder shall be computed and determined upon the basis of this return.

"(b) Regulations: The Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, shall prescribe such regulations as he may deem necessary in order that the tax liability of any affiliated group of corporations making a consolidated return and of each corporation in the group, both during and after the period of affiliation, may be determined, computed, assessed, collected, and adjusted in such manner as clearly to reflect the income and to prevent avoidance of tax liability.

"(c) Computation and payment of tax: In any case in which a consolidated return is made the tax shall be determined, computed, assessed, collected, and adjusted in accordance with the regulations under subsection (b) (or, in case such regulations are not prescribed prior to the making of the return, then the regulations prescribed under section 141 (b) of the Revenue Act of 1932 insofar as not inconsistent with this act) prescribed prior to the date on which such return is made.

"(d) Definition of 'affiliated group': As used in this section an 'affiliated group' means one or more chains of corporations connected through stock ownership with a common parent corporation if—

"(1) at least 95 percent of the stock of each of the corporations (except the common parent corporation) is owned directly by one or more of the other corporations; and

"(2) the common parent corporation owns directly at least 95 percent of the stock of at least one of the other corporations.

As used in this subsection the term 'stock' does not include nonvoting stock which is limited and preferred as to dividends.

"(e) Exception: A consolidated return shall be made only for the domestic corporations within the affiliated group. An insurance company subject to the tax imposed by section 201 or 204, or a personal holding company subject to the tax imposed by subchapter A of chapter II, shall not be included in the same consolidated return with a corporation subject to the tax imposed by section 13 or 14, and an insurance company subject to the tax imposed by section 201 shall not be included in the same consolidated return with an insurance company subject to the tax imposed by section 204.

"(f) China Trade Act corporations: A corporation organized under the China Trade Act, 1922, shall not be deemed to be affiliated with any other corporation within the meaning of this section.

"(g) Corporations deriving income from possessions of United States: For the purposes of this section a corporation entitled to the benefits of section 251, by reason of receiving a large percentage of its income from possessions of the United States, shall be treated as a foreign corporation.

"(h) Subsidiary formed to comply with foreign law: In the case of a domestic corporation owning or controlling, directly or indirectly, 100 percent of the capital stock (exclusive of directors' qualifying shares) of a corporation organized under the laws of a contiguous foreign country and maintained solely for the purpose of complying with the laws of such country as to title and operation of property, such foreign corporation may, at the option of the domestic corporation, be treated for the purpose of this title as a domestic corporation.

"(i) Suspension of running of statute of limitations: If a notice under section 272 (a) in respect of a deficiency for any taxable year is mailed to a corporation, the suspension of the running of the statute of limitations, provided in section 277, shall apply in the case of corporations with which such corporation made a consolidated return for such taxable year.

"SEC. 755. Invested capital.

"(a) As used in this subchapter—

"The term 'intangible property' means patents, copyrights, secret processes and formulae, goodwill, trade-marks, trade-brands, franchises, and other like property;

"The term 'tangible property' means stocks, bonds, notes, and other evidences of indebtedness, bills and accounts receivable, leaseholds, and other property other than intangible property;

"The term 'borrowed capital' means money or other property borrowed, whether represented by bonds, notes, open accounts, or otherwise;

"The term 'inadmissible assets' means stocks, bonds, and other obligations (other than obligations of the United States), the dividends or interest from which is not included in computing net income under chapter I, but where the income derived from such assets consists in part of gain or profit derived from the sale or other disposition thereof, or where all or part of the interest derived from such assets is in effect included in the net income because of the limitation on the deduction of interest under section 23 (b), a corresponding part of the capital invested in such assets shall not be deemed to be inadmissible assets;

"The term 'admissible assets' means all assets other than inadmissible assets, valued in accordance with the provisions of subdivision (a) of section 756 and section 757.

"(b) For the purposes of this subchapter the par value of stock or shares shall, in the case of stock or shares issued at a nominal value or having no par value, be deemed to be the fair market value as of the date or dates of issue of such stock or shares.

"SEC. 756. Invested capital construed.

"(a) As used in this subchapter the term 'invested capital' for any year means (except as provided in subdivisions (b) and (c) of this section)—

"(1) actual cash bona fide paid in for stock or shares;

"(2) actual cash value of tangible property, other than cash, bona fide paid in for stock or shares, at the time of such payment, but in no case to exceed the par value of the original stock or shares specifically issued therefor, unless the actual cash value of such tangible property at the time paid in is shown to the satisfaction of the Commissioner to have been clearly and substantially in excess of such par value, in which case such excess shall be treated as paid-in surplus: Provided, That the Commissioner shall keep a record of all cases in which tangible property is included in invested capital at a value in excess of the stock or shares issued therefor, containing the name and address of each taxpayer, the business in which engaged, the amount of invested capital and net income shown by the return, the value of the tangible property at the time paid in, the par value of the stock or shares specifically issued therefor, and the amount included under this paragraph as paid-in surplus. The Commissioner shall furnish a copy of such record and other detailed information with respect to such cases when required by resolution of either House of Congress, without regard to the restrictions contained in section 55;

"(3) paid-in or earned surplus and undivided profits; not including surplus and undivided profits earned during the year;

"(4) intangible property bona fide paid in for stock or shares prior to January 1, 1940, in an amount not exceeding (a) the actual cash value of such property at the time paid in, (b) the par value of the stock or shares issued therefor, or (c) in the aggregate 25 percent of the par value of the total stock or shares of the corporation outstanding on January 1, 1940, whichever is lowest;

"(5) intangible property bona fide paid in for stock or shares on or after January 1, 1940, in an amount not exceeding (a) the actual cash value of such property at the time paid in, (b) the par value of the stock or shares issued therefor, or (c) in the aggregate 25 percent of the par value of the total stock or shares of the corporation outstanding at the beginning of the taxable year, whichever is lowest: Provided, That in no case shall the total amount included under paragraphs (4) and (5) exceed in the aggregate 25 percent of the par value of the total stock or shares of the corporation outstanding at the beginning of the taxable year; but

"(b) As used in this subchapter the term 'invested capital' does not include borrowed capital.

"(c) There shall be deducted from invested capital as above defined a percentage thereof equal to the percentage which the amount of inadmissible assets is of the amount of admissible and inadmissible assets held during the taxable year.

"(d) The invested capital for any period shall be the average invested capital for such period, but in the case of a corporation making a return for a fractional part of a year, it shall be the same fractional part of such average invested capital.

"SEC. 757. Reorganizations.

"In the case of the reorganization, consolidation, or change of ownership of a trade or business, or change of ownership of property, after December 31, 1939, if an interest or control in such trade or business or property of 50 percent or more remains in the same persons, or any of them, then no asset transferred or received from the previous owner shall, for the purpose of determining invested capital, be allowed a greater value than would have been allowed under this subchapter in computing the invested capital of such previous owner if such asset had not been so transferred or received: Provided, That if such previous owner was not a corporation, then the value of any asset so transferred or received shall be taken at its cost of acquisition (at the date when acquired by such previous owner) with proper allowance for depreciation, impairment, betterment, or development, but no addition to the original cost shall be made for any charge or expenditure deducted as expense or otherwise on or after March 1, 1913, in computing the net income of such previous owner for purposes of taxation.

"SEC. 758. Returns and payment of tax.

"Every corporation, not exempt under section 752, shall make a return for the purposes of this subchapter. Such returns shall be made, and the taxes imposed by this subchapter shall be paid, at the same times and places, in the same manner, and subject to the same conditions, as is provided in the case of returns and payment of income tax by corporations for the purposes of chapter I, and all the provisions of that chapter not inapplicable, including penalties, are hereby made applicable to the taxes imposed by this subchapter."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, in the light of the emergency about which the Senate has heard so much from different Senators during the past few months, it is my firm conviction that this tax bill will go down in history not only as a sham and a delusion but also as one of the most inequitable tax measures ever passed by Congress.

It is not necessary for me to repeat what has been said so well regarding the inadequacy of this measure in the light of expenditures already made and contemplated. In my opinion it will not stay on the statute books more than 7 or 8 months. The proposal to set up a 5-year amortization fund, as designed in this bill, to meet national defense expenditures, commits the Congress, if it were to follow that policy, to a course which cannot be carried on in the future.

So, Mr. President, in my judgment there is no possible excuse for the pressure which has been put upon the Finance Committee and the Senate in the consideration of this measure. This bill will not bring into the Treasury of the United States between now and the next regular session of Congress in January in excess of $225,000,000, and yet every Senator who proposes any amendments to seek increased revenue is told that we had better wait until we can have a revision of the tax laws at the next session of Congress.

If any more illogical proposition was ever presented to a supposedly intelligent Congress I have yet to read about it. We are to pass this bill under whip and spur. Neither the committee nor the Senate will give consideration to amendments proposed to it, and what is the net result? Two hundred and twenty-five million dollars paid into the Treasury of the United States between now and the time when the proponents of the measure insist that any amendments which are not now considered will have an opportunity to be considered.

In short, Mr. President, in one breath we are told that we must pass this bill, that it must be passed at once, that important amendments cannot receive adequate and careful consideration by the committee or by the Senate; and in the next breath the committee and the report contend that there will be a general revision of the tax laws at the next session of Congress.

Either one thing or the other is wrong, Mr. President. Either we are not going to have a general revision of the tax laws at the next session or else this 5-year plan will be torn apart, and we shall have to review the entire action that we are taking at this session.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am interested in what the Senator says about the necessity of revamping and overhauling the whole tax structure of this country. Everybody seems to be agreed that we must do that. Is not that true?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. CONNALLY. Answer that, if you please.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am going to answer it.

Mr. CONNALLY. I was trying to help the Senator, and trying to agree with him. If he wants to rebuff me, of course, that is all right.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not want to rebuff the Senator, but I want to answer his question in my own way.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator does not want me to ask the question in my own way, I withdraw it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thought the Senator had concluded the question.

Mr. CONNALLY. I had not concluded at all.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In any case, I will answer the portion of it which the Senator asked me.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator will do so on his own volition, then, and not at the request of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Very well; I will do it on my own volition, and not at the request of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. President, it has been stated ever since I have been a Member of this body that we are to have a general revision of the tax laws; and in the consideration of nearly every piece of legislation bearing upon the question of taxes we have been urged not to propose amendments because we were to have a revision of the tax laws at the next session of Congress. So, Mr. President, I have little faith in the promises which are held forth in connection with this legislation that we are to have an early revision of the tax laws at the next session of the Congress.

In making that statement I do not question the good faith of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, nor of the genial chairman of the Senate Finance Committee; but I have heard these promises coming from these gentlemen, I feel assured in all sincerity, ever since I have been a Member of this body, for now nearly 15 years, and the general revision of the tax laws never takes place. Frankly, I am apprehensive that if we pass this piece of legislation and put it upon the statute books, if there is any revision of the tax laws at the next session of Congress, it will come so late in the session that we shall once more be confronted with the same technique of "blitzkrieg" that is being applied to this bill and to amendments tendered to it.

The only excuse for passing this bill at all at this session is to afford the increases which it provides upon the excise taxes to go into effect on the first day of July, because, I repeat, it is only money from the excise taxes which will flow into the Treasury between now and the next regular session of Congress.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. BYRD. The Senator is exactly correct about that. I received a statement from the Treasury Department that in July only $15,000,000 will be collected under the pending bill, in August $57,000,000, in September $34,000,000, in October $38,000,000, in November $36,000,000, and in December $36,000,000. So that in this calendar year only $216,000,000 will be collected under this tax bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator is correct, and that is the only reason for passing the tax bill at all.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will pardon me, but that is not even the chief reason. I share the Senator's view, but that is not the chief reason for passing this bill. The chief reason is the raising of the debt limit. If we have any real regard for the possibilities of a situation which carries explosive power with it, we cannot delay the passage of the bill, in my judgment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator has anticipated me. I was referring to the reasons which could be predicated upon tax grounds, and I was just coming to the question of the increase in the debt limit.

Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia as I stated, has anticipated what I was about to say. There is a second reason not involved in the tax situation, namely, the necessity of increasing the debt limit, which can be advanced as a justification for the passage of the pending measure.

The tragedy about the whole thing is that the country is under the impression that Congress is passing a tax bill designed to meet the added responsibilities and burdens upon the Government and upon the people in relation to national defense and it does no such thing.

I have long been an advocate of, in fact, I think I initiated in the Senate the proposal to broaden the base of the individual income tax. I fought for it in season and out in this Chamber whenever I had an opportunity presented by action by the House of Representatives to which such amendment could be added in the Senate. So, I think no one will question that I have been a sincere advocate of that policy.

But I say that for Congress to broaden the tax base on individuals in the lower income-tax brackets, for the Congress to increase the inequities in our tax structure by tremendously increasing the burden which is levied without regard to ability to pay, through the excise taxes, and to fail to adopt an excess-profits tax to reach those who will profit out of the huge defense expenditures which Congress has voted will, in my opinion, go down in history as one of the most inequitable propositions Congress has ever passed.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Does not the Senator know that some of those who will profit by making war munitions are saying that if heavy taxes are imposed on them, that if the taxes on their profits are raised, the Government will not be able to get cooperation, or that they will not be able to get cooperation? So they do not want to have any taxes imposed on them or taxes on their profits raised, which would amount to the same thing as war profits, because they will not cooperate if that is done.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, that was not our experience during 1917, 1918, 1919, 1920, and 1921, when we had an excess-profits tax. It was one of the greatest revenue producers ever employed by this Government.

Mr. President, I repeat, I cannot see how Congress can justify in this emergency reaching the long arm of the Federal Treasury into the pockets of the people in the lower-income groups of this country by broadening the tax base. I do not see how Congress can justify reaching the long arm of the Treasury into the pockets of people who pay the excise taxes and at the same time refuse to increase the taxes upon those corporations which, directly and indirectly, will profit by the very expenditures which are made possible in part by the taxes which these low-income-group families are required to pay.

Mr. President, how is that to be justified? How will it be possible to convince the people of this country that sacrifices for national preparedness are to be equitably adjusted? Is there to be an attempt to satisfy them by quoting from the report of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, or by rising and reading a statement of the Senator from Mississippi in the Senate that they hope or expect to pass an excess-profits tax at the next session?

Why were not the income-tax payers told, why were not the people in the lower income-tax groups told, why were not the children who go up to the ticket window with the pennies in their hands to see a movie told that the whole structure was to be revised at the next session of Congress, and that therefore we were not imposing the taxes now? Why impose a burden on one group of taxpayers with the enactment of a tax law and let the other group of taxpayers, the corporations which will make large profits out of the defense expenditures, get off with an expression in a report of the Ways and Means Committee and a statement by the chairman of the Finance Committee that they will be taxed when and if we ever get around to it? Some Senators may want to go out before their constituencies and defend such an inequity. I for one wish to be absolved of any such responsibility.

In the light of this emergency, each and every person in the United States, each and every corporation, should be asked to carry his fair share of the cost of national defense and the running expenses of the Government based on ability to pay.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I emphatically agree with the viewpoint which the Senator is expressing, but I have this further difficulty in my own mind. Even with the Senator's amendment, the tax bill is still utterly inadequate for the purpose to which it pretends to be addressed. It still is a sham and a snare and a delusion, so far as either paying for national defense is concerned, or so far as settling the accumulated deficits of the 7 last spendthrift years is concerned.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I agree with the Senator that the bill does not raise enough revenue even with this amendment in it to meet the deficit, and to meet the cost of national defense, but if we are to make any effort at all at this time, we should make a fair and an equitable effort, we should have some justice in our hearts and in our minds when we impose these taxes.

As the chief advocate in this body for the last several years for broadening the tax base, I state that I consider that it is a gross inequity to the low-income taxpayers to ask them to increase their taxes and contributions to the Federal Government, and, at the same time fail to ask the corporations which are going to be enriched by the necessity of the Government for national rearmament in this crisis to carry their fair share of the load, according to their ability to pay.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, what estimate does the Senator make as to how much in revenue his amendment would bring in?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have not any Treasury estimates on the subject. I attempted to get estimates, but the Treasury Department replied that it would take them a long, long time to get any estimates on it. I am convinced, after conferring with some experts on this subject, that the amendment, if enacted into law, would produce in the first year of its operation, 1940, between $400,000,000 and $550,000,000 of revenue.

I know what the answer of the gentlemen who represent and speak for the majority of the committee will be to arguments which I have made. They will say that they are as ardent advocates of excess-profits taxation as am I, but they will say that this is a very complicated subject, that it is one which will take a great deal of time and study to settle. If that advice had been taken or if a similar policy had been adopted in 1917 the Government of the United States would have failed to collect two and one-half billion dollars of corporate income from 1918.

If they had followed the idea that it was too complicated a matter and failed to retain it on the statute books, the Government would have failed to get $1,400,000,000 of excess profits on the 1919 income.

We had an excess-profits tax in 1917. We had one in 1918. In 1921 the law was changed in some respects. So we have had experience in this country with an excess-profits tax between the years of 1917, when it was first enacted, and in 1922, when it was repealed.

So it cannot be said that this proposal is novel, or that we have had no experience under the law.

In drawing this amendment I have endeavored to build upon that experience. I do not claim that it is perfect, but I claim that it obviates many of the difficulties experienced under the 1917 and 1918 and subsequent years of the excess-profits tax, and I say that in justice to the taxpayers of the United States who are going to be shouldered with this momentous burden of national defense, built on top of the running expenses of the Government—we should enact this amendment, and if any difficulties or hardships are experienced under it, then let it have the same treatment as will the other provisions of this bill when the general revision promised by the Ways and Means Committee and by the chairman of the Finance Committee takes place next year.

Mr. President, I have made some little effort to study the problems of taxation before I went on the Finance Committee and since I have been a member of that powerful committee of the Senate. Taxes are complicated matters, but a moot debate upon tax theories can go on from now until the end of time. Literature on the subject is voluminous, and the experts can debate from now until the end of time and they will not come to any conclusion.

The only way in which we are going to get an excess-profits tax and have it operative upon 1940 incomes of corporations is to pass it now.

Let me briefly describe the amendment. It imposes an excess-profits tax on corporations based on invested capital for 1940 and subsequent years. Before the tax applies to the corporation it must have a net income in excess of $3,000 plus 8 percent of its invested capital for the taxable year. In other words, an 8-percent return is permitted before this tax applies, plus $3,000.

Mr. President, in all probability this amendment could be attacked on the ground that 8 percent, in the light of return now obtainable upon invested capital, is overly generous, but in order that there should be no claim that the amendment proposed here on the floor of the Senate was unduly harsh, I have taken the rates of the 1921 act.

The rates of tax are the same as those imposed for the year 1920. These rates are: 20 percent of the net income in excess of the credit and not in excess of 20 percent of the invested capital, and 40 percent of the amount of the net income in excess of 20 percent of the invested capital. Corporations are, in addition, subject to the present corporate tax on their net income, which, under the pending bill, amounts to approximately 21 percent during the next 5-year period. This rate is considerably higher than the corporate rate which was in effect in 1920, the rate at that time being only 10 percent. It is therefore my opinion that the 20 and 40 percent excess-profits tax rates are sufficiently high to take care of the immediate situation without imposing higher rates.

In conformity with the old law, personal-service corporations would not be subject to this tax for the reason that capital is not a material income-producing factor in corporations of that type. This is also true with respect to personal-holding companies which are now subject to surtaxes on their undistributed profits as high as 75 percent, in addition to the existing corporate taxes. It is also true with respect to foreign personal-holding companies, which are taxed like partnerships as far as American shareholders are concerned, in that the American shareholder is required to take up his distributive share of the net income of the corporation, whether distributed or not, and such income is therefore subject to our present surtaxes.

Since the stock owned by one corporation in another corporation is excluded from the invested capital of the first corporation, dividends received from such subsidiary corporation by the parent are not included in income for the purpose of computing the excess-profits tax.

A taxpayer who has sustained a substantial loss in inventory during 1940 is given relief through the filing of a claim in abatement of the tax computed for such year. A similar provision was contained in the excess-profits tax in effect for 1920.

Allowances are made for amortization of such part of the cost of the facilities as has been borne by the taxpayer. However, in order to secure an amortization allowance, the facilities must have become obsolete or cease to exist or have been sold prior to 1 year after the date that the President proclaims the need for emergency production of articles essential to the prosecution of a war.

Consolidated returns are restored for the purpose of this tax in order to prevent evasion of the tax.

The definition of invested capital is the same as that contained in the Revenue Acts of 1918 and 1921. It is my firm conviction that this will simplify the procedure somewhat, since the invested capital of many corporations has already been determined under those acts, and with that as a base adjustments will only have to be made for the years during which the old excess-profits tax was not in effect.

The corporations are allowed net losses under the existing law for the purpose of the corporate income tax. This provision is made applicable with respect to the excess-profits tax by section 753 of my amendment.

I now wish to revert to a table which will show the effect of the excess-profits tax on the specimen net incomes of corporations with various amounts of invested capital.

Mr. President, let us take a corporation with $3,000 of invested capital. If it has $5,000 of net income it will pay a tax of $360. If it has income of $25,000 it would pay a tax of $4,860.

Let us take a corporation with $150,000 of invested capital, and let us assume that it had an income of $25,000. It would pay a tax of $1,800.

Let us take a corporation with $10,000,000 of invested capital and a net income of $1,000,000. It would pay a tax of $35,460 under this amendment.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have this table inserted in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Effect of excess-profits tax rates on specimen net incomes of corporations with various amounts of invested capital

Invested capital	NET INCOME
	$5,000	$10,000	$15,000	$25,000	$50,000	$100,000	$200,000	$300,000	$500,000	$750,000	$1,000,000	$2,000,000

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, what are the justifications for this tax insofar as what has been happening to corporate profits are concerned? Corporate profits were high during the fourth quarter of 1939. I have before me a comparison of the profits of the last quarters of 1937, 1938, and 1939, as taken from the earnings statistics of Standard Statistics, Inc. The combined index shows that in the last quarter of 1937 the index stood at 77.8; in 1938, at 72.5. In the last quarter of 1939, it was 114.5.

In 1937 the industrials had an index for the last quarter of 81.4; in 1938, 70.8; in 1939, 118.8. In the last quarter of 1937 the index for railroads stood at 2.7; in 1938, at 34.1; in 1939, at 74.2. The index for utilities in the last quarter of 1937 was 135.9; in 1938, 114.5; and in 1939, the index for the last quarter stood at 135.9.

Another way in which we can interpret this table is in the form of percentages. In short, the industrial profits were almost 46 percent higher in the last quarter of 1939 than in the last quarter of 1937, and 68 percent higher than in 1938.

If we refer to the statistics of income of the United States Department of Commerce, and look at the income payments by kind, the 7 months' war period from September 1939 to March 1, 1940, compared with identical months a year before shows that wages and salaries for the period from September 1938 to March 1939 were $25,410,000,000. For the period from September 1939 to March 1940 they were $26,405,000,000, or a percentage increase of 3.9.

Dividends and interest, in the period from September 1938 through March 1939, were at $4,894,000,000; but in the period from September 1939 to March 1940, they were $5,735,000,000, or an increase of 17.2 percent.

Entrepreneurial income and net rents and royalties for the period September 1938 through March 1939, amounted to $7,229,000,000; but in the period from September 1939 through March 1940, they had risen to $8,738,000,000, or an increase of 20.9 percent.

In short, Mr. President, dividends and interest rose, in the period from September 1939 to March 1940, 17.2 percent above the corresponding period for the previous year; entrepreneurial income and net rents and royalties rose 20.9 percent, but wages and salaries rose only 3.9 percent. This is a significant statistical comparison arguing for the enactment of this amendment if we are to make an effort to distribute the tax burden at all equitably.

Mr. President, I wish to read briefly from some clippings of the New York Times financial section, showing examples of increased corporation profits since the war in Europe began on September 3, 1939. I have selected these clippings at random. They are only a small portion of those which I could bring to the attention of the Senate if I wished to take more time this afternoon.

Here is one under date of January 31, 1940:

ONE HUNDRED CONCERNS SHOW 67 PERCENT RISE IN PROFITS—FIRST TO REPORT FOR 1939 HAD NET OF $514,363,000, AGAINST $308,171,000 YEAR BEFORE—WAR BOOM WAS A HELP—FIGURES COMPILED BY ASSOCIATED PRESS REVEAL SHARP GAINS BY 21 RAILROADS

Earnings of the first 100 companies to report for the full year 1939 were 67 percent larger than those in 1938, according to a compilation issued yesterday by the Associated Press.

Large profits which piled up in the brief war boom of the final quarter of the year helped increase the earnings of the group to $514,363,000, compared with $308,171,000 in 1938.

In other words, Mr. President, 100 companies increased their earnings in the first half-year of the war in Europe by more than $200,000,000, as compared with their earnings for the year 1938.

Mr. President, shall we pass a tax bill snatching the pennies out of the hands of children who want to go to the movies, increasing the Federal gas tax half a cent a gallon, and going down into the lower-income brackets, and fail to ask the corporations of the country, in proportion to their ability to pay, to carry their fair share of the load? That is what we shall be doing if we pass this bill without an excess-profits-tax amendment.

Here is another clipping:

Airplane concern trebles earnings—Glenn L. Martin Co. has $2,162,670 net in first quarter—$682,496 in 1939—Backlog of $92,016,023—Contracts on hand call for bombing craft for the United States to cost $16,000,000.

I read from a number of similar clippings:

MACHINERY FIELD SHOWS PROFIT RISE—PROFITS OF 109 COMPANIES IN 1939 PUT AT $66,702,118 AGAINST $36,492,998—83 PERCENT GAIN IN YEAR—BUT RESULT IS 30 PERCENT UNDER THE $95,163,910 ACHIEVED BY CONCERNS IN 1937

(By Kenneth L. Austin)

Manufacturers of machinery in the United States made a strong recovery in earnings in 1939, compared with the year before, and the results indicate that the outbreak of war in Europe has stimulated the demand from abroad for types of machinery used in production of munitions and construction of defenses.

The combined profits of 109 companies in the mechanical industry were $66,702,118 in 1939, compared with $36,492,998 in 1938, a gain of 83 percent. The result was 30 percent below the profits of $95,-163,910 for the same companies in 1937.

In 1937 much money was spent in the rehabilitation and construction of factories of every sort in the United States, although the over-all program was curtailed in the latter part of the year by the deep recession that began in midsummer. Hence the strong gain of 1939 indicates the effects of heavy foreign buying for many types of machinery rather than the restoration of domestic buying to former levels.

Quarterly results show that the boom in machinery production in the final quarter of 1939 was not fully reflected owing to the fact that numerous companies made charges for the year in the final quarter which properly should be allocated over previous quarters, the figures used representing the difference between reported annual results and cumulative figures for the first 9 months.

The quarterly reports compare as follows, the figures in brackets denoting the number of companies reporting:

	General factory machine (12)	Machine tools (6)	Outdoor machinery (13)
1939:
Fourth quarter	$4,153,997	$1,028,534	$3,830,453

In most instances the figures are for calendar quarters, but a few figures are for business periods of variable length which correspond roughly to quarters.

CHRYSLER REPORTS RECORD EARNINGS—RESULTS IN BEST FIRST QUARTER WERE $15,742,388, AGAINST $11,638,290 LAST YEAR—SALES ALSO THE HIGHEST—KELLER TELLS OF ORDERS FOR BOMB FUZES, SHELLS, AND OTHER WAR EQUIPMENT

"The corporation has received from the War Department diversified educational orders for ordnance such as bomb fuzes, shells, and cartridge cases, and a special department for handling this character of business has been organized. In addition to ordnance a very substantial military-truck business has been developed."

AIRWAYS COMPANY CLEARS $1,984,438—PROFIT PEAK FOR PAN AMERICAN IN 1939 REPORTED BY JUAN T. TRIPPE, PRESIDENT

Juan T. Trippe, president of the Pan-American Airways Corporation, reported yesterday for 1939 a net profit of $1,984,438, equal to $1.46 each on 1,361,964 capital shares, compared with $46,672, or 3 cents a share, earned in 1938. Last year was the most successful in the history of the company, he said.

Ford Motor profit put at $16,402,746—net for 1939, based on balance-sheet items, against loss of $18,560,459 in 1938.

Income increased in first quarter—International Paper and Power earnings rise to 99 cents a share from 1 cent.

Sales and profits of Sears at peaks—total for year ended on January 31 largest in 54 years of business, officers say.

United States Steel reports $17,113,995 profit—first-quarter net is equal to $1.24 a share, against 18 cents on 7-percent stock year ago—shipments 25 percent better.

National Steel Corporation made $1.82 a share to March 31; $1.10 in 1939.

Speaking of this company, export orders, which usually account for about 5 percent of production, currently are taking about 15 percent of output, Mr. Weir said.

United States Steel cleared $41,226,039 in 1939.

Corporation had a net loss of $7,714,454 in 1938, and profit of $94,944,358 in 1937.

Inland doubles profits.

Steel company and subsidiaries netted $10,947,251 in 1939.

Mr. President, we not only have the situation produced by foreign orders, but as everyone knows, a substantial program got under way last year, so far as our own rearmament was concerned. This, however, will be merely a drop in the bucket compared with the increased expenditures for that purpose as a result of the program enacted or to be enacted by this Congress before it adjourns. Let me point out how rapidly the expenditures were rising in 1940 as compared with 1939.

In 1939 the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce reports that the monthly average of national defense expenditures by the Federal Government was $108,000,000; but in January 1940 it had risen to $134,000,000. In February it was $131,000,000. In March it was $145,000,000. In April it was $163,000,000.

Mr. President, we are appropriating upward of $4,000,-000,000 at this session of Congress for national-defense appropriations, and we have not yet adjourned. Is it not essential, if we are to have an equitable tax structure, that the Congress should enact an excess-profits tax in order that the corporations which are benefiting not only directly but indirectly from the huge expenditures which are being made shall be required to share the huge burden which the people of this country must undertake?

At this point I desire to quote examples of substantial returns on invested capital in so-called normal years. I read from a statement of percentage of net profit on invested capital of selected corporations, 1934 to 1938, from the Securities and Exchange Commission reports.

Here is a group of the aircraft companies:

In 1934 the Bellanca Corporation made 18.63 percent net profit on invested capital. By 1938 that profit had risen to 29.20 percent.

The Consolidated Aircraft Corporation had a net profit on invested capital of forty-four one-hundredths of 1 percent in 1934. In 1938 it was 39.54 percent.

The Wright Aeronautical Corporation had a net profit on invested capital of 15.01 percent in 1934, but by 1938 it was 40.36 percent.

Nonferrous metals:

The International Nickel Co. had a net profit on invested capital of 11.63 percent in 1934. It had risen to 18.30 percent in 1938.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I am wondering if labor received a corresponding increase. The records show that wealth increases and poverty deepens.

There is an old oriental saying that when the rich grow richer and the poor grow poorer, something happens.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have not the comparable figures, but I think there is no indication of a corresponding rise in wages. I quoted here figures from the Department of Commerce income reports showing that between September 1938 and March 1939, compared with September 1939 through March 1940, wages and salaries rose only 3.9 percent, whereas dividends and interest rose 17.2 percent and entrepreneural income and net rents and royalties rose 20.9 percent.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, I should like to say that the able Senator from Wisconsin is rendering distinguished service to America when he calls attention to the disparity in these figures between the wages of labor and the rewards of capital invested. Certainly we can collect taxes from the top; and why not do just that? Why tax these millions on the bottom? Why tax the roofs from their heads, the clothes off their backs, and the bread from the mouths of their children? I am against lowering the tax base down upon the backs of the poor while we permit the rich to escape.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, take the Sperry Corporation, for instance: In 1934 its net profit on invested capital was 28.47 percent. In 1938 it was 51.57 percent. I ask to have the data printed in full at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[1] From Securities and Exchange Commission reports. The ratio was computed by taking the net operating result for the period before interest, prior claims, and income tax, and dividing this amount by the total of invested capital at the end of the period. Invested capital was computed as follows: Long-term debt plus net worth plus minority interest. Net worth was derived by subtracting deficit carried as an asset, treasury stock carried as an asset, preferred stock held in sinking fund, and discount on capital stock from the total of capital stock and surplus. Total debt was taken as the sum of long-term debt and current liabilities.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, this amendment is an equitable amendment. It allows 8 percent profit, plus $3,000. It takes only 20 percent in the first bracket and 40 percent in the second. Is it not fair, is it not equitable, to ask corporations which are making such a large percentage of profits on their invested capital to pay, in accordance with their ability to pay, a portion of this enormous increase in expenditures due to national defense?

In 1937 the S. E. C. reports show that out of 499 corporations, 146 earned less than 5 percent on invested capital; 231 had profits between 5 and 15 percent on invested capital; and 122 had profits of over 15 percent.

Mr. President, I am not advocating this amendment solely as a means of reaching the windfall which will be enjoyed directly and indirectly by corporations in this country. I believe that the enactment of excess-profits-tax legislation will bring about a sound reform in our tax structure; that it will apply the principle of ability to pay in a measure to the corporations of this country as we now apply the principle of ability to pay in our graduated income taxes.

I think it is economically sound for corporate business to be required to be taxed according to the principle of ability to pay.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. WILEY. I am very much interested in the argument my colleague has been making. I am informed that England practically has not taxed corporations, but has taxed the taxpayer himself, realizing that the corporations produce industry. I am wondering whether my colleague has looked into that feature, and the reason for that method of taxation in England.

I call the attention of my colleague to this significant thing, that if the corporations of this country had not created a reserve in 1929, the storm which we experienced then, which was a pretty good storm, would have been a hurricane. I think the facts show that the corporations of this country exhausted their reserves and paid out a great deal more than the Federal Government did. I am wondering whether, in the consideration of the excess profits, my colleague has considered the advisability of permitting a percentage of revenue to be set aside as a reserve for the purpose of taking care of labor in the years that are ahead. Everyone claims that after the war is over we will run into a depression. I think the distinguished Senator from California made several speeches to that effect, and I think the distinguished Senator from Maryland did likewise. I am wondering whether in this picture there should not be reserves built up, not with the idea that the stockholders should benefit, except as labor would benefit. If that were done, it seems to me that everyone would agree that anyone who profits now should pay the additional tax.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. DOWNEY. Contrarywise to what the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin has asked his colleague, I should like to ask the senior Senator from Wisconsin whether he has considered that economists now are very much in agreement that it was the accumulation of the tremendous reserves, and the stagnation of those great sums of money, which tended to bring on the depression of 1929, and may tend to bring on another depression.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, in response to the inquiry made by my colleague, I will say that a considerable amount of data and testimony was presented to the Finance Committee on that very subject, in connection with the consideration of the undistributed-profits tax, and of course, as in all these matters, there is a divergence of opinion as to whether or not the accumulation of the reserves by corporations contributed to their ability to continue employment during the period of the depression. The Senator can find a considerable amount of statistical material and economic argument on both sides of that question.

So far as I am personally concerned, I have no doubt that the accumulation of huge corporate reserves contributed greatly to the excesses of the boom period prior to 1929, and I think that the evidence shows that the excess reserves carried by corporations did not result in prolonged continuation of manufacturers building up their inventories, which could not be sold after 1931 and 1932. In other words, no matter how willing, no matter how humane, no matter how humanitarian the managers of a corporation may be, there comes a limit to their ability, in fairness to their stockholders, to continue to operate and manufacture and build up inventories when they cannot sell their goods.

It is my personal opinion that the experience of corporations in the period of 1930, 1931, and part of 1932, when President Hoover and others were encouraging them to believe that the depression would be of short duration, and they did build up inventory, and ultimately took a terrible licking on it, was one of the reasons why the decline in the fall of 1937 and 1938 was so precipitous, because the moment they found inventories piling up in the fall of 1937, they curtailed production in order to save themselves from the tragic experience which they had had at the onset of the depression.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, would the Senator yield further so I may suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, no.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. ASHURST. Again we hear—and I do not know whether it is accurate or not—that a drive is being made looking toward an adjournment on next Saturday.

I wish to assist in the passage of the tax bill, but unless we can have some assurance that there will be no attempt to adjourn this body next Saturday, I shall feel justified, and so will other Senators, in using every proper means known to prolong the situation, and force Senators to abandon the idea of adjourning Saturday. When the collapse in Europe is upon the world, with its resultant crisis to the United States, serious men propose an abandonment of their duty.

Therefore, Mr. President, I call upon the responsible leadership to advise us that there will be no attempt, in any circumstances, to adjourn this body next Saturday. Unless we can have such assurances—and we ought to have them—it would be useless to attempt to try to pass this bill under whip and spur.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not know whether or not the Senator from Arizona has concluded.

Mr. ASHURST. I call upon Senators frankly to declare and give us assurance that there will be no attempt to adjourn next Saturday. That is only 3 or 4 days away. The calendar is filled with bills of a very important nature. There is the transportation bill. If we fail to take action on the transportation bill, or at least furnish a stopgap of some sort, 20,000 men, not in Government employ, but in private employ, at good wages, will lose their positions within 20 days. Yet it is proposed by some serious men that the Congress adjourn.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I can only say that I made my position clear on the matter of adjournment many weeks ago, and I protested in the Finance Committee, as I have tried to protest here, against jamming this tax bill through on the theory that it had to be passed in order that we could get through next Saturday night.

I share the Senator's feeling that we should not adjourn. I am not in favor of taking a recess until next August, or any such proposition. Unfortunately, I cannot answer the Senator. I do not speak for the majority. I do not speak for the larger minority over here, with whom I sit because of the seating arrangement. I can speak only for myself, but I make no bones about speaking very frankly on the question of recess or adjournment. I am against it, and I think the country is against it. I think the people want to see their representatives remain here during this critical period. But if the Senator wants assurances which will be good for anything, he will have to get them from someone who represents more votes in the Senate, at the moment, than I do.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMATHERS in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know to what the Senator from Arizona referred when he mentioned the transportation bill, unless it was the bill which passed both Houses and remained in conference half of last year, and was taken up in the House of Representatives and defeated by recommitting it to the conference committee, following which the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] announced that that meant the transportation bill was dead so far as this session was concerned. I had assumed that he spoke by the card. So far as I know, the conferees have not met again since the House recommitted the bill to the conference committee, and it might be entirely possible to remain here without recess or adjournment until Christmas, and still have no transportation bill, so far as present prospects are concerned.

Let me say about the matter of adjournment that until very recently I think it was practically the unanimous feeling of the Members of Congress that, as soon as legislation was enacted which was deemed necessary, Congress would adjourn. Of course, the situation has changed in the last month or so. I think it extremely doubtful whether any effort will be made to adjourn Saturday. But this is the situation, and we might as well be practical. It may be that there even ought not to be a recess over the conventions, but we might as well consider that there will be little, if any, legislation enacted while the conventions are in session.

Next week there will be no legislation, practically speaking. That will take us up to the 1st of July. Then the Fourth of July season will be at hand, when, of course, many Senators will want to take advantage of the opportunity to make patriotic speeches. Of course, they do not have to do that, but they like to do it and their constituents like them to do it.

Then the other convention will meet in Chicago on the 15th day of July and there will be no business transacted probably during that week. That will take us up to the 21st of July.

It has been thought at least worth while to consider whether it might not be wise to recess from Saturday until some date around the 1st of August, to get by the conventions, and to give Members an opportunity to circulate a little among their constituents, to determine really what they feel about what is going on in this country and around the world. Personally I think it would be a wholesome thing if Members could go back to their constituents for a few days and talk with them and argue with them. It may be that they ought to take the leadership in their communities and their States with respect to certain matters which are subject of repeated debate here.

I recall in my own case—and I have not been in my own State since Christmas—that when I left Kentucky during the Christmas week everybody I saw, those in the churches, on the streets, in the Rotary Clubs, in the chambers of commerce, and on the farms, everywhere, were saying to me, "Keep us out of war. Keep us out of war. No matter what happens, keep us out of war." Now we get letters from our States. There has undoubtedly been some change in the attitude of the people toward the war in Europe.

I happen to represent a State of 3,000,000 people. I probably have received a thousand letters one way or the other on the subject. I do not know whether or not those thousand letters represent the 3,000,000 people I am trying to represent here.

I do not see how any harm could come, frankly speaking, and I really believe it would be wholesome—it would do Congress good, it would do the country good, it would certainly do the people good, if we were to go back among our people for a week or two and go out among them, out in the country, go to a church on Sunday morning, and listen to how they feel about all this, go to the lodges, stand on the street and listen to the people talk, talk to the farmers. Not many of them have written to me. Talk to the women out in the communities and in the schools. Find out what they are really thinking.

I believe that a little cessation from legislation, and certainly a cessation from heated oratory on both sides of this war situation, would be wholesome. It would do Congress good. It would do the country good. And even if we were to recess from next Saturday until the 1st of August, the President could call us back 3 days afterward, if any emergency arose that would justify him in doing so.

In those circumstances, I will say to my friend the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] frankly that consideration is being given—I do not know whether or not it will be worked out—consideration is being given to the proposition that we might recess at the end of this week, assuming that we pass the necessary defense legislation which has been asked and urged, until some date around the first of August, without doing any harm to Congress or to the Government or to the cause of legislation.

I am not dogmatic about it. So far as I am concerned, I personally do not care whether we recess or adjourn. I will be here in the performance of my duties to the best of my ability.

But we are a representative government, and, after all, whatever we do here must be backed up by the opinion of our people. We cannot go any faster than they go. We ought not to go very much more slowly than they go, but certainly we ought to try to represent them.

I have believed, and I now believe, that it would be a wholesome and a beneficial thing if, assuming that we wind up the necessary and urgent legislation this week, Congress should recess for a month at least in order that the things I have mentioned might be brought about; but I wish to say to the Senator from Arizona very frankly that no effort is to be made to adjourn sine die Saturday, and I do not know when such an effort will be made.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. First, I wish to say that the speech made by the able Senator from Kentucky is just and fair. I am bound to admit there is force in what he has said, as there is force in nearly everything he says, and that there is usually much wisdom in his speeches.

The trouble with the statement of the able Senator from Kentucky is that he says "after we shall have passed such legislation as is deemed of importance and necessary for national defense." That is the very trouble, Mr. President. A number of Senators differ among themselves as to what is urgent and important legislation. I have the calendar before me, and I have marked a large number of bills thereon, some of them House bills and some of them Senate bills, which, in fairness to our constituents and in fairness to the American people generally, should be passed. The able Senator, by his intuition, correctly identified the bill when he referred to the transportation bill which came from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and it was with much regret that I heard him say that the able Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] had concluded to abandon any attempt to pass that bill.

Mr. President, I have known the able Senator from Montana since his young manhood. Long ago I predicted that he would rise even to a higher place than a seat in the Senate, and it is very uncomplimentary to say of him that he would run away, abandon, give up any attempt to have passed a transportation bill when the country needs it most seriously. I am not asking that the transportation bill as it was written by the Senate or by the House or by the conferees shall be adopted; but I say—I will not take the time to prove it—that if this body adjourns without taking some action on the transportation bill, 20,000 men now drawing good wages, not from the Government but from private industry, will lose their situations and will lose their wages. That is a serious matter, Mr. President. Twenty thousand able men, men of high-grade ability, will lose their positions unless some sort of transportation bill is passed by July 1.

Mr. President, I am not going to do as I had intended to do, read off the calendar of bills. In 1932 many persons saw the depression coming. The Republican National Convention was in session. The Senate manfully did its duty, notwithstanding the fact that the Republican National Convention was in session. Then the Democratic Convention was held, and the Senate stayed here manfully and did its duty to the country although the Democratic Convention was in session.

Mr. President, we are faced with a great crisis. We have heavier duties to perform now than were imposed upon us in 1932. The able Senator from Kentucky would be chargeable with remissness and neglect if he failed to attend the Democratic Convention. It is his duty to be there because he has upon him a great responsibility as a leader, justly earned, which he will continue to uphold. I should say he would not be living up to his responsibility as the party leader if he should fail to attend the Democratic National Convention. Others may not be in the same situation. But I say the sourest note we could sound, the most depressing thing we could do, would be to continue this talk of adjournment, and under the whip and spur of the necessity of adjourning next Saturday, drive through legislation. The able Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], who has an unusual power of expression, in speaking of the tax bill said, "Certainly the time to operate is when the patient is ready, willing, and anxious." That is the truth, not only in politics, but in business and medicine. The time to operate is when the patient is ready, willing, and anxious. The people say, "We expect you to pass a tax bill." This should be—and I think it is—a very good bill, but let us not shrink from the full discussion of this bill and all others which mean the strength and security of our country.

John Milton said that the way to succeed is to scorn delights and live laborious days. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] has said that we ought to go home and not "panhandle" the voters; of course he would not resort to such an expression, but he indicated at least that we ought to go home.

Mr. BARKLEY. I did not use that expression.

Mr. ASHURST. I know the Senator would not use it.

Mr. President, I know how the voters of this country stand. Does the Senator need to be told how the people of the country view the present posture of affairs? Does the Senator mean to say that he must go home and stand around on drug-store corners to find out what the people think? Does he have to go home to find out what the people think about the European war?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Let the Senator tell us, if he knows what the people think we ought to do about the war.

Mr. ASHURST. Indeed I shall. Will the Senator allow me to tell him?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. ASHURST. First, demonstrate that democracy can act in a crisis, and not run away from its duties. Running away from its duties is what brought France, the nation of light and culture, to her prostrate position. Many members of her parliament, in a cowardly way, ran away from their duties and would not face them. The first thing we should do is to show the country that we are not abandoning our duties, but are here performing them.

Secondly, carry out the President's program of rearmament and preparedness. Announce that the American eagle says, "We will allow no aggression." Stop the aggressor at the door. Keep out of Europe's wars.

Does the Senator think I am misspeaking the sentiment of the people?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not believe 1 percent of the American people want an American soldier sent to Europe. Their deaths would be unavailing martyrdom. Men may be heroes, but their martyrdom is unavailing unless they are well trained.

Mr. President, I should be glad to go home. I have a political campaign in the offing. I gnaw at my chains here. I can stand defeat with perfect equanimity, but I do not intend to have attached to me the stigma that I ran away from my duty and helped to demonstrate that democracy could not operate in time of peril.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I am through.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in the first place, I wish to correct what might be regarded as a misunderstanding of my reference to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]. Certainly the Senator from Montana never runs away from the performance of his duty; and I will say that the Senator from Montana, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN], and other members of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, of which I happen to be a member—though I could not engage in the details of the legislation to a very great extent—spent more time on the transportation bill than on any piece of legislation I know of in the past few years in this or any other body. They worked hard in committee. They held long hearings. The bill passed the Senate. It went to the House, and the House committee held long hearings. All that was written in the Senate bill was stricken out and a new bill was written, which passed the House. It went to conference, and it was in conference for 2 months. The bill was finally brought to the floor of the House, and it was defeated.

There is nothing pending before either House on the subject of transportation, and it would be legislatively impossible to pass a bill on that subject by July 1. When the House took that action the Senator from Montana was quoted in the newspapers as stating that, in his judgment, that meant the death of transportation legislation for this session. In making that statement the Senator from Montana was somewhat realistic. He was stating facts when he said that he believed that the defeat of the conference report in the House made it impossible to obtain legislation on the subject.

Mr. President, I certainly would be the last to create the impression, or to want the impression to be created, that the Senator from Montana, by recognizing the inevitable, as it seemed to him, was running away from the performance of his duty.

The Senator from Arizona has referred to what has happened in other countries. He has said that the defeat of the Allies was brought about because their parliaments ran away from the performance of their duties. I do not know whether that condition was brought about by their specifically leaving the seat of legislation, or whether they ran out on their duties or failed to perform them while they were in session. I do not know as to that. It is just as easy to fail to perform our duties while we are in session as it is when we are out of session.

It seems to me that this is a practical situation. We know that during next week we shall do nothing of very great importance. Our friends on the other side of the aisle are interested in a great occasion. Although we might regret it, our Constitution requires that we elect a President of the United States in this country next November; and in the ordinary processes of bringing about that election conventions are to be held. Men are to be nominated by the two parties for President of the United States. That is not a duty which can be neglected. That is not a casual circumstance. In my judgment, nothing more important can face the people of the United States this year than to determine who shall govern our country for the next 4 years. That being true, men are sensible if they desire to take part in the performance of that duty and the selection of those who are to be voted for in November.

If it be true that during next week we cannot do much, and shall be merely drifting along, many Senators may go home. They might not return to Washington during the intervening 2 weeks between the convention in Philadelphia and the convention in Chicago. I think I can assure the Senator from Arizona that, regardless of adjournment or 3-day recesses, we shall be in session during the coming fall, beginning early in August. Even if we were to adjourn—which I am not now advocating—or recess until the first of August, or take 3-day recesses and do nothing, I think it is entirely likely, and I can almost guarantee, that we shall be here from August on.

I think the very subject now under discussion in the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin is one which is entitled to early consideration. It is entitled to be taken up and passed upon. If we are to pass a bill, an amendment, or a provision along the lines of his amendment, American industry ought to know it is soon as possible, so that it will know how to govern itself in the future.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I have no way of divination. I believe that the American people expect us, as a Congress representing them, to render to the Allies all possible material aid—airplanes, machinery, supplies, and so forth. By "aid" they distinctly do not mean sending American soldiers to foreign countries. They expect us to remain in session to give aid so necessary to the Allies. If we adjourn, or even take recesses for 3 days at a time, we shall be in such a situation as to be powerless to pass bills looking toward rendering to the Allies the aid so necessary at this time.

So, Mr. President, I am not charging the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] with having abandoned his duties. I say that it is strange for the Senator from Kentucky to announce, as a responsible leader, that no attempt will be made to pass a transportation bill. The fact that it has been defeated means but little. It is within the literary and legal resources of the Interstate Commerce Committee at any time to bring forth a bill which will meet approval. If they are unable to agree on the large bill, which I think is Senate bill 2009, they might pass a stop-gap bill, or a temporary expedient which would at least serve until the regular session next January.

Mr. President, I do not want to be a party to stopping the progress of the pending bill; but I want to feel assured that no movement will be made looking toward any adjournment next Saturday.

One of the most wholesome things that have happened, one of the things that justify a republican form of government, is that here on the opposition side, on the Republican side, are two candidates for President who, whatever be their fate——

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will not the Senator put in the actual number?

Mr. ASHURST. No, Mr. President—whatever be their fate, they at least have demonstrated that they are worthy. We have never heard a word from either Republican Senator who is a candidate for President about adjournment, because he knew—he had prescience enough, judgment enough, to know—that if he talked a moment about adjourning, his political fortunes would collapse like a house of cards. We have not heard a word from either one of them about adjourning, because the votes they have, be they many or few, would disappear, they would show themselves to be unworthy of Presidential honors, if they talked of adjournment at this critical time.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Senator will permit me at that point, it is unnecessary to talk about Congress adjourning when the candidate himself adjourns whenever it suits him. [Laughter.]

Mr. ASHURST. I did not catch that statement.

Mr. BARKLEY. I said that it is not only unnecessary but probably would be indelicate for a candidate for President to talk about Congress adjourning or not adjourning when he himself, as an individual candidate and Senator, may adjourn whenever it suits him, and go all over the country advocating himself as a candidate. So it is easy for a candidate not to say anything about it when he runs all around, from one end of the country to the other, adjourning himself. [Laughter.]

Mr. ASHURST. If any candidate for President has done that, he has weakened his candidacy just that much by the number of days he was absent.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am naming no names.

Mr. ASHURST. No; I did not think so. If any Republican candidate has abandoned his duties and has gone out barnstorming for delegates, he has degenerated and weakened his candidacy just so much.

Mr. BARKLEY. Just a word, and then I am not going to take any more of the time of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The Senator from Arizona has made light of our suggestion that we ought to keep in touch with our people. I have been here a long time, and so has the Senator from Arizona. We sit around here in this Chamber and these cloakrooms and we hear noises, because Washington is a sort of sounding board for all sorts of noises as well as nostrums. Sometimes we hear imaginary noises, and we think the world is about to come to an end; and we go back among our people and we find that they are calm and deliberate and going about their business, and have not even heard the noise that has scared us in Washington out of a year's growth.

So far as I am concerned, I am unconcerned about whether we recess, or adjourn, or meet every day from now until Christmas. I can assure the Senator, I think, that no motion will be made to adjourn sine die at the end of this week; and another thing: We have passed every piece of legislation of the defense program that has been asked except this tax bill and the supplemental appropriation bill, which has already been reported and will be taken up tomorrow.

Mr. ASHURST. Asked by whom?

Mr. BARKLEY. By the President, or by the Department of War, or the Department of the Navy, or those who are undertaking——

Mr. ASHURST. Is the able Senator from Kentucky going to put himself in the position that the only measures we ought to consider are those that have been asked by the executive department?

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, no.

Mr. ASHURST. We are the legislative branch. There are bills on the calendar not asked by the Executive that should be submitted for his consideration and signature. We do not require the ipse dixit of the Executive to legislate.

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, no. The Senator from Arizona cannot put words in my mouth. I am talking about the defense program. The calendar is full of bills that have not been considered, and probably the country would be better off if some of them never were considered; but they are here, and they are entitled to be considered if Congress wants to stay here to consider them. But what I am talking about is that if by Saturday night the tax bill, the appropriation bills, the naval-expansion bill, and the entire defense program have been completed, the country would not suffer very materially if for 2 or 3 weeks we suspended legislation of another character, not connected with our national defense.

Mr. ASHURST. Senators and Representatives would not suffer, because their salaries would run on; but 20,000 stalwart workers would suffer somewhat when their salaries were cut off.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Arizona has emphasized the railroad bill, and I have tried to explain the situation. I do not believe there is a Member of the Senate who thinks that by the first of July any legislation on that subject is possible. We talk about stopgap legislation on a great railroad or transportation subject. The Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate and the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House have been working for a year and a half on transportation legislation. There is no more important subject. After they have worked for a year and a half their work seems to have been nullified by the vote of another body. It is not an easy matter for that committee to get together overnight, or in a month, and work up a stopgap piece of legislation that can be passed in both Houses of Congress and meet the approval of the Executive. So I think we must look at that subject, as all other subjects, in a practical way.

I apologize to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] for taking up this time; but I did feel it my duty to unravel my mind to the Senator from Arizona. Whether or not it has unraveled his, I do not undertake to say.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, in further response to the statement made by my colleague the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] some time ago, I will say that Great Britain imposes an excess-profits tax, allowing only 6 percent return, and takes 100 percent of the excess above that amount.

Canada likewise has an excess-profits tax and is taking a very substantial amount of the excess profits over the allowed return.

If we want to collect this tax, I think it is essential that we enact it now. It is true that if Congress should go to work on this subject next January, it could pass a bill and make it retroactive to apply to 1940 incomes; but, Mr. President, can you not hear the hue and cry which would be raised if any such effort were made? Corporations would say that they had made their plans without regard to the excess-profits tax, and that it would be unfair and unjust to make the tax retroactive.

I do not claim that this amendment is perfect; but I do claim that in the light of this emergency we can reenact the 1921 excess-profits tax, with certain changes made in the light of experience under that tax to make it more definite and more workable. If there develop changes which are necessary, there will be an opportunity in January to make such changes.

Mr. President, I fear that if this tax is not imposed now, when the Congress reconvenes in January, with all of the delays that are inherent in an effort to revise the entire tax structure, the measure will be a long time in passing through both Houses of Congress and becoming a law, and that there will be great resistance to making the excess-profits tax retroactive.

Therefore, Mr. President, I appeal to the Senate to attach to the pending bill this amendment, which is based largely upon the 1921 act, with certain changes and adjustments made in the light of the experience under that act, with certain simplifications eliminating alternatives which that act gave to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. I appeal to the Senate thus to establish the principle, thus to show to the country that we propose, in accordance with ability to pay, to call for increased taxes from corporations making excess profits, upon the corporations with large profits, including profits from the huge armament expenditures which will mount month by month as the defense program gets under greater headway.

Mr. President, I wish to say, in conclusion, what I said at the beginning. I am for equitable taxation. I was brought up to believe in taxes levied in accordance with the principle of ability to pay. During my service in this body I have seized every occasion afforded by legislation passed through the House of Representatives dealing with revenue to move in the direction of imposing taxes and distributing burdens in accordance with ability to pay. But despite every effort I have been able to make, the increasing burdens of taxation have more and more been shifted over onto the direct taxes, which are levied not in accordance with the principle of ability to pay, but which fall heaviest upon those who have the least ability to pay.

In the pending tax bill such taxes are being jacked up; they are being further increased; we are reaching down into the lower individual income-tax group, as I have advocated here for many years. But when it comes to accepting a proposal to tax corporations upon their excess profits in accordance with ability to pay, in this critical emergency, we are told we have not time; we are told that it is a complex subject; we are told that we must wait until the Ways and Means Committee begins a general revision of the income-tax law.

Mr. President, I have been waiting for that general, scientific, comprehensive revision of the income-tax law, which has been promised every time a tax bill has been before the Senate during the 15 years I have been a Member of this body.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. As I understand the Senator's idea of raising war taxes, it is that those who make the profits out of war should pay the taxes for the conduct of the war. There is nothing confusing about that—it is very simple—and it should not take very long for the Finance Committee to arrange for that kind of a tax.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I do not want to have my proposal confused with the proposal which will subsequently be made, I understand, by the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] to impose a tax predicated upon the theory that it is to go into effect when and if this country is involved in actual war. I am offering this excess-profits tax proposal as a permanent addition to our tax structure. I am offering it especially in the light of the increased profits which corporations are certain to make as a result of our huge armament program.

Mr. President, those representing the majority of the Finance Committee will no doubt claim that this amendment has not been sufficiently studied; that it has not been sufficiently considered in detail. It is predicated on the law which the Finance Committee of the Senate and the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives considered and Congress passed in 1921. It had consideration at that time in the light of the experience between 1917 and 1921 with excess-profits legislation.

We may debate the high-spun theories of taxation and the problems inherent in excess profits until we are black in the face, but we will not get down to the proposition of collecting the tax if we continue to debate the question in the high realms of mere theory.

This amendment has been on the statute books, to all intents and purposes. Under it substantial amounts of revenue were collected. I appeal to the Senate to put it into the pending bill; let it go to conference; let it have consideration in conference; and let it be enacted into law as a part of the pending measure. Let us assure the people that we are not only going to lower the individual income-tax brackets; that we are not only going to jack up the excise taxes, which are paid in the largest proportion by the people who have least ability to pay; but let us likewise assure the country that we are going to ask corporations, in accordance with their ability to pay, and in accordance with the profits they make out of the armament program, to carry their fair share of the huge burden.

Mr. President, I do not know anything which would be more shocking or more disappointing to the people than to have Congress enact a tax bill increasing the burden upon those who have the least ability to pay, and fail to ask the corporations which derive the largest percentages of profit out of the armament program, to carry their fair share of the burden.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. Apparently we are getting ready also to demand the services of the young men in this country in the Army on a compulsory basis. I am not willing to force the young men of the United States to assume compulsory military training, which apparently they will have to assume, if we are not going to make the people who are engaged in the business of making money pay a substantial part of their profits in taxes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I appreciate the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana. His entire record in the Senate shows that he would not take any but the equitable position which he has just announced.

In the name of equity, in the name of justice, I appeal to the Senate to adopt the amendment. It will be no answer to the people to wave in their faces a promise made by the Ways and Means Committee that there will be consideration of an excess-profits tax at the next session of Congress.

In conclusion, let me say that I do not think there could be any worse blow to the morale of the people of the United States than to pass the pending tax bill without providing for the taxation of the excess profits of corporations.

AMERICA'S POSITION TOWARD THE WAR IN EUROPE

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, America can be kept out of the European war. Every responsible statesman throughout our history has inveighed against our involvement in the quarrels and real-estate titles of Europe.

Today our veterans speak out in no uncertain voice against our meddling over there.

I ask unanimous consent at this point in my remarks to have printed in the RECORD a statement from the headquarters of the American Legion which begins with this sentence:

The hour has struck for the American Legion to take a vigorous stand and assume leadership to keep this country from involvement in war.

I should like to read the whole statement, but I realize that the hour is late, so I shall be content merely to ask that it be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN LEGION AND THE WAR IN EUROPE

(Statement issued from American Legion headquarters, Washington. O. K. Armstrong, of Springfield, Mo., member of the foreign relations committee, declares that the hour has struck for the American Legion to take a stand against involvement of the United States in war. Mr. Armstrong, magazine writer, conferred last week with National Commander Raymond J. Kelly and with Foreign Relations Chairman Wilbur Alter)

The hour has struck for the American Legion to take a vigorous stand and assume leadership to keep this country from involvement in war.

The program of the American Legion, from resolutions of past national conventions and committee actions, stands squarely for keeping our country at peace through a strong national defense and noninterference in the quarrels of other nations. Legionnaires everywhere should make an effort to carry out the mandate of the last national convention in Chicago, which reads:

PREVENT INVOLVEMENT IN THIS CONFLICT

"We not only believe that this Nation need not become involved but insist and demand that the President of the United States and the Congress pursue a policy that, while preserving the sovereignty and dignity of this Nation, will prevent involvement in this conflict."

National Commander Kelly has repeatedly stressed that our security and that of our hemisphere are our primary concern. It is time for the Legion to rally behind him to a man in his recent declaration that it is idle to consider the feasibility of intervening in the great conflict across the Atlantic.

LEGION COMBATING ALL PROPAGANDA

The Legion program calls for combating all propaganda designed to break down our neutrality. If any who plead for our participation in war do so with the hope of profit of any kind—financial, industrial, political, or any other—they should be branded as enemies of our American homes, institutions, and ideals.

We need sane thinking and fast, calm, silent action. A strong man well armed needs no hostile and bitter words to assert his defense.

We must halt the cultivation of the feeling that war inevitably awaits us. It is the American tradition to create good will among men and nations, and the American Legion should take the lead now as never before in continuing that tradition. As a Nation intent upon preserving democracy, we shall need all the friendship of foreign governments and peoples we can find.

In recent conferences with National Commander Kelly and Chairman Alter I have pledged my time and energy to this task. I hope my fellow Legionnaires will do likewise.

The greatest contribution the veterans of the last World War can make to America and the world is to preserve our Nation on guard and at peace.

AMERICAN WARSHIPS FOR GREAT BRITAIN

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, I notice in the press of this morning a report that 30 warships were sold to Great Britain. I repeat it is a press report. However, the Washington Times-Herald states that the report of sale of these ships was confirmed by the Senate Naval Affairs Committee. Therefore, I judge it to be true. I have no definite information on the subject beyond that. If this be true, then in the interest of every true American we certainly ought to investigate who controls and governs this country.

LORD LOTHIAN DEMANDS OUR SHIPS

Some days ago I mentioned the first report on this matter, and I referred to Lord Lothian's address at Washington and Jefferson College on June 8 (United Press dispatch) and his demand on the United States for warships, guns, and war materials.

I want to say that I do not join with those who wish to aid the Allies, if there are any Allies now, that France is done.

Anything that we sent to France a short time ago is Hitler's today. And when you saw the picture in the Star the other night showing thousands of 75-millimeter guns on the decks of a 30,000-ton French liner going over to England with our artillery—I take it, practically all our 75's—I have no assurance that that artillery will not be Hitler's in a very short time.

ISLANDS AND AMERICAN DEFENSE

Mr. President, I think the best way to defend America is to acquire bases on both our coasts and fortify them—air bases and naval bases—fortify our country here on this side of the Atlantic. Build our defenses here, and, above all, build our air defenses, with a separate department for the air. Brigadier General Mitchell urged that some 20 years ago. Twenty-one years ago—on the 28th of February 1919—I introduced a bill on that subject. On June 29, 1935, and May 21, 1940, I again introduced bills to provide for a separate Department of Air.

Let us build our defenses on this side of the Atlantic and keep America strong, remembering that our own best defense is our own strong right arm, and that there is nothing else upon which we may lean in the hour of trial.

TAXING AMERICA FOR EUROPE

I am not interested in aid for Great Britain or tax bills or appropriation bills which merely appropriate money for war materials and ships to be turned over to foreign governments.

At this point in my remarks I ask to have printed in the RECORD an article published in the Washington Times-Herald of today under the heading:

Thirty United States warships sold to England. Senate committee investigating.

I ask that this article be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of June 19, 1940]

THIRTY UNITED STATES WARSHIPS SOLD TO ENGLAND—SENATE COMMITTEE INVESTIGATING DEAL

The Roosevelt administration has released to the British Government 20 of the Navy's fast torpedo boats and submarine chasers.

At a recent investigation of the incident, Senator DAVID I. WALSH (Democrat), of Massachusetts, chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, told Lewis Compton, acting Secretary of the Navy, that he ought to resign.

REPORT CONFIRMED

This information was disclosed to the Chicago Tribune Press Service in official quarters yesterday and was confirmed by members of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee.

The released vessels include 10 torpedo boats and 10 submarine chasers in service and 10 harbor-defense or mosquito vessels that are not completed and were not scheduled for delivery to the Navy before August.

The harbor-defense boats are said to have tremendous speed. They mount a gun suitable for action against submarines, carry one torpedo tube, and have intricate sound-locating apparatus for detecting the presence of submarines.

COST NOT REVEALED

The cost of these vessels and the details by which the transfer is to be effected could not be learned immediately. The Senate Naval Affairs Committee obtained its information concerning the deal during a series of hearings in executive session on a bill to expedite the shipbuilding program.

Members of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee said they knew of no statutory authority for the release of naval vessels to a foreign government, or to turn them into shipbuilders for resale to foreign governments. The trade-in procedure was followed in the airplane and ordnance deals.

DESTROYERS WANTED

From a naval officer permanently attached to the committee and from other naval officers who appeared as witnesses, the committee learned the British were eager to buy American destroyers and that Secretary of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau was putting pressure on the Navy in behalf of the British.

The committee thereupon asked Chairman WALSH to call upon President Roosevelt and demand to know what, if anything, had been done about the British request for destroyers. Senator WALSH demurred on the ground that Mr. Roosevelt would pledge him to secrecy. He agreed to write a letter to the President requesting the information.

COMPTON CALLS WALSH

Meanwhile the naval attaché was instructed to say nothing about the committee's plans. When Senator WALSH was writing his letter to the President, Compton telephoned to him and said he understood the committee was requesting certain information from the President.

Compton told Senator WALSH that the Navy had not released any destroyers but that, in all fairness, it should be said that certain other craft had been released. Chairman WALSH thereupon summoned Compton to appear before the committee, which he did, last Friday.

According to members present it was a stormy session. Chairman WALSH wanted to know what authority of law the Navy had for its action. He demanded to know whether the Navy had consulted its Commander in Chief, President Roosevelt.

ROOSEVELT NOT CONSULTED

Compton replied that Mr. Roosevelt had not been consulted, but that Secretary Morgenthau had urged that the vessels be released.

At this point, members of the committee said, Chairman WALSH asked Compton: "Why don't you resign?"

Other members of the committee did not feel that there was any obligation upon Compton to resign or that he had any more to do with the transaction than the execution of orders.

Morgenthau's participation in the negotiations recalled the part he played early in 1939 in obtaining the release of secret military aircraft for French and British purchasing missions. The crash of a Douglas attack bomber, built for the Army, with a French Army officer aboard, resulted in a Senate investigation.

WAR STOCKS RELEASED

Acting under 1917 statute, the administration has released Army and Navy airplanes, including naval dive bombers delivered within the last 6 months, to the British and French. Under special authority rushed through the Congress, the administration has released huge stocks of the Army's World War rifles, 75-millimeter guns, mortars, machine guns, and ammunition to the British and French.

SCUTTLING OUR DEFENSES

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, when members of our Naval Affairs Committee say that they know of no statutory law or authority for giving these powerful war vessels to foreign nations, nations that may some day turn the guns of these very ships against us, what can we say? Is this loyalty to America and to our country's best interests? Shall we continue to permit this treason? Shall traitors to the flag that flies above us scuttle our defenses and give our last weapons—land, air, and sea—to the empires of the Old World?

MANEUVERING BEHIND THE SCENES

Our Senate Naval Affairs Committee state that they did not sanction the release of our ships. This treachery was apparently accomplished in secret. Other disloyal transactions may have been secretly carried through. How do we know? All this maneuvering behind the scenes certainly lays the foundation for a thorough investigation to the end that American taxpayers who paid for these war vessels may be protected from foreign-minded interventionists.

ALTERATION OF BRIDGES OVER NAVIGABLE WATERS—VETO MESSAGE

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, I desire to make the announcement that the President's veto message on the bill (H. R. 9381) to provide for the alteration of certain bridges over navigable waters of the United States, for the apportionment of the cost of such alterations between the United States and the owners of such bridges, and for other purposes, was acted upon in the House of Representatives this afternoon and, upon reconsideration, the bill was passed and messaged to the Senate. At the most convenient opportunity I expect to call up the bill for action in the Senate.

REVENUE BILL OF 1940

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10039) to provide for the expenses of national preparedness by raising revenue and issuing bonds, to provide a method for paying for such bonds, and for other purposes.

Mr. GEORGE obtained the floor.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wish to announce that it is the purpose to continue the session tonight in an effort to conclude action upon the tax bill. I make that announcement for the benefit of Senators who may wish to arrange their affairs accordingly.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I do not wish to delay the Senate at this late hour, and particularly upon this amendment, but inasmuch as an appeal has been made by the Senator from Wisconsin to adopt it now, without any real consideration of what the amendment is, except that it was one time in the law, I feel constrained to make a very brief statement about it.

Upon the question of an excess-profits tax, there will be little dispute in the Finance Committee, I apprehend, or in the Senate. There is, however, no reason to consider the excess-profits tax now because in any event we are coming back here in January, and the excess-profits-tax provision can be inserted in a tax bill which is necessary—not a matter of choice, but which is necessary and which can be made retroactive over identically the same period, and certainly the business of the country is on notice that an excess-profits tax will be adopted before the next taxable year begins to run.

Mr. President, I know very well that we have talked about passing a general or comprehensive tax bill in the future, but we face such a situation that an additional tax bill must be passed at the January session of the Congress. It is not a matter of choice. If it were a matter of choice, we might be disposed to agree and say that perhaps Congress could find some convenient reason for putting off to another time the consideration of the tax measure. But, as a matter of fact, we will be obliged to consider another tax measure, whether or not we remain in session, at least in early January; and identically this tax, if it be the viewpoint of the Congress that it should be imposed, may be made retroactive over the entire taxable year 1940, and identically the same sum of money collected, or some sum of money, if the Congress should be of the opinion that this particular tax is not wise.

As to the question whether we are to remain in session, of course I do not know what Congress may do, but personally I think the Congress should remain in session. I can only say to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] that, so far as my vote is concerned, I shall vote to stay here without recessing, except 3 days at a time, and under a gentleman's agreement that during the convention periods we will not take up any important matters. I can see no reason why we should not stay here, and I think the country wants us to stay here. I believe it to be our duty to stay here, and, therefore, I am going to vote to stay here. If we do stay here, as soon as we can get the necessary data and consider some important questions involved in this type of tax, we should begin to write an additional tax bill and whip it into shape and pass it. If we do not do that, we must come back in January anyway, and we can make this tax retroactive over all of 1940 and certainly will be able to accomplish the same purpose.

Mr. President, it may be said that business would have some reason for saying in January that we should not make this tax retroactive, but that can hardly be so when the Ways and Means Committee, when it was considering this tax bill, agreed with the Treasury Department that the experts on the staff of the Joint Committee on Taxation and the staff in the Treasury Department would begin deliberation immediately on this particular question and would as soon as the necessary data could be gotten in hand make recommendations upon which could be based a sound tax measure.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Joint Committee on Taxation, to which the Senator refers, is an agency of the Congress itself, charged with the duty of obtaining the necessary information upon which tax legislation can be enacted, and it seems to me we are bound to give full credence to their statement, as well as that of the Treasury, that they cannot under 30 days and probably even longer, obtain all the necessary information upon which Congress can enact a fair excess-profits tax.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to remind the Senate that when the last tax bill was under consideration the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] prepared an amendment providing for taxation of income derived from tax-exempt securities. He intended to offer that to the bill. He was dissuaded from offering it to that bill on the assurance that there would be a general revision of taxes at the next session of Congress, and that full opportunity would be given for the consideration of that proposition. Furthermore, to my certain knowledge, it was announced—I think 2 years ago, if not last year—that the joint committee staff and the Treasury staff were instructed to go to work to prepare for a general revision of the tax structure; and yet we are now passing another makeshift tax bill, with amendments being pushed aside on the theory that the joint committee and the Treasury experts are once more to go to work.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin is assuming that the tax measure he offers is wholly free from difficulty, and that we have all the necessary information on which to act. I am trying to point out as best I can that, in my opinion, Congress will not adjourn at all, and I do not think it should; but if it should adjourn, we shall certainly have to return in January. The Treasury Department and the Ways and Means Committee of the House, in a rather formal way, have advised the country that the excess-profits tax would be considered, and that it would be within the power of the Congress, if it so willed, to make it retroactive over the present year, 1940.

I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin that on occasion we have not always found it convenient to do the thing we promised to do. I also agree with the Senator from Wisconsin upon the broad proposition that we must have an excess-profits tax. I have no doubt about it. I fear we may have some other kind of tax, even on top of the excess-profits tax. We may have a sales tax, though I have never voted for one. But I think it must be taken for the truth that we cannot rest upon the tax bill before us, in view of the fact that already we are increasing our national debt by $5,000,000,000. Whatever may become of the war in Europe, whatever turn it may take, we shall go forward with a defense program which will run our national debt even beyond the appropriations made at this session, so we must have additional taxes and we must of necessity consider this question along with the question of other sources of revenue when we proceed, either now or in January, to face that problem. It is not a theory.

Let me say to the Senator from Wisconsin that I have precisely the view he has; that is, that we ought not to have relied upon a tax program which would have produced a relatively small part of the revenue which the Government now so seriously needs, and we should have proceeded to a more general revision of the tax laws. I thoroughly agree with that position, especially in view of the Treasury recommendation that we simply take the additional excess taxes plus the 10-percent increase upon existing taxes, and raise some $660,000,000.

The real necessity for the passage of the bill at a reasonably early hour is to authorize an increase in the national debt.

We might as well be clear politically. It would perhaps be impossible to increase the national debt without also raising some revenue. Members of the Senate entertain varying judgments upon that important question. Some do not believe in increasing the national debt. A great many do not believe in increasing the national debt without also making some attempt to raise additional revenue. The bill does raise a sizable amount of additional revenue. It is estimated to raise a little more than $1,000,000,000, which, on top of our other taxes, is a very considerable increase in revenue.

We must consider the tax question again. We must live up to our agreements and pledges. We can consider the question of excess-profits taxes, at least in January, and, as I hope and think, before January, because I do not think we should adjourn.

We are not witnessing the accumulations of fortunes upon the scale of fortunes accumulated in the period from 1914 to 1919, and I do not think we shall do so. Already the war in Europe has narrowed to one belligerent upon one side and two active belligerents upon the other side. Already the vast population and the large Army of France are actually out of the fighting, or we must assume that they are practically out of the fighting. It undoubtedly is true that Great Britain had made all her plans for this war without drawing so strongly upon the resources of the United States. In other words, she had made her plans elsewhere to obtain wheat, tobacco, cotton, and all the raw materials for her manufacture and, in large part, to support her population. There may be, and undoubtedly there are, some industries in the country which will make increased profits; but by and large, American industry need not expect to enjoy the swollen fortunes which came about as a result of the last World War. Even before this Congress adjourns the war may have ended.

Of course no one can say as to that, and no one wishes to speculate about it; but I think it is reasonably certain—as certain as any man may feel justified in making the statement—that this country will not enter the war. Day by day the sentiment of the American people grows stronger against any possible involvement in the European war. So there will not be a tremendous war boom. Indeed, Mr. President, those in industry, and perhaps even in agriculture, who depend upon a war boom will be sadly disappointed. But assuming that they will not be, and assuming that we should levy an excess-profits tax even if there were no war, because we shall need additional revenue—assuming all that, and facing the facts as they are, there must be a revision of the tax laws, because we have too large a deficit in our ordinary expenditures, and we know that if we carry forward even the projected national-defense program, the expenditure on that account will be large.

Mr. President, let me call attention to the fact that the Senator from Wisconsin proposes the excess-profits tax which we had during the previous war period, as it was changed and modified through 1921. The measure imposed no taxes upon excess profits except profits earned by corporations. There may be excess profits earned in the war by individuals, by copartnerships, or by associations. The basis of the tax in all prior acts, and in the amendment which the Senator has offered, is invested capital. A return of 8 percent is permitted upon invested capital, and there is an exemption of $3,000.

Great Britain has an excess-profits tax, but it is not based upon invested capital. France has an excess-profits tax, but it is not based upon invested capital. Canada has an excess-profits tax. It is not based upon invested capital. Even Germany has an excess-profits tax, a very high one, and it is not based upon invested capital. There are many of us who honestly think that is the proper basis for an excess-profits tax.

Under the excess-profits tax of the war period, all kinds of complications arose. It did produce revenue, but vast sums of revenue produced by it had to be returned to the taxpayers. There are today pending suits growing out of that excess-profits tax, built upon the basis that we built it, involving more than $13,000,000—suits for the recovery of that amount of money—and in all human probability many of those litigants will be successful. We might have litigation on any tax basis; but I am perfectly confident in my own mind that the Treasury is right when it says there are numerous questions that ought to be examined, and that it will require some 60 days, at least, to get all of the data and make all of the examination required to be able to submit to us an excess-profits tax that will cause us the least possible trouble.

Personally, I feel very strongly that the basis of the excess-profits tax should be simply this:

The tax should be levied upon profits which are above the average profits of the corporation, partnership, or individual in the same enterprise over 1, 2, or 3 years prior to the time the tax goes into effect. I think that is right, because I think we shall have to retain the excess-profits tax if the war ends immediately, because we shall need the revenue. I think there can be little doubt about it.

We cannot go on with a very large peacetime deficit, let us say, in order to distinguish it, and a constantly mounting cost of national defense which I think the country has resolved to have even though the war should end. If the war should end some of our ardor for national defense might cool off, but not all of it; and I feel sure the American people have reached the conclusion that it would be most unwise for us to neglect our national defense.

Sr, Mr. President, with the Treasury statement that it will be at least 60 days before there can be gathered the dependable data upon which they can proceed to write or suggest an excess-profits tax which will not lead to the complications of the wartime excess-profits tax, and with the certainty that in January, at least, we can impose the tax and make it retroactive over 1940, it would seem that we should acquiesce in and accept the judgment of the Treasury Department in this instance.

Let me call attention also to this fact:

Under the excess-profits tax offered by the Senator from Wisconsin and the excess-profits tax which we had during the war period it would be quite possible for a corporation to pay an excess-profits tax running as high during the war period as 80 percent when it was not making as much money as it made before the war. Take the case of any corporation with a relatively small invested capital which happens to earn a considerable sum of money, which happens to earn dividends for a few years, and after we levy the excess-profits tax upon the basis of invested capital allow a deduction only of 7 or 8 percent, or whatever percentage is agreed upon, on the invested capital as against the earnings, and it is quite possible to see that in many instances the corporation with a small invested capital is placed at a very great disadvantage.

It is perfectly fair, I think—although the committee might not agree with that view, and might accept the proposal offered by the Senator from Wisconsin—it seems to me to be perfectly fair to say that we shall impose an excess-profits tax on all profits in excess of the average earned by the corporation during, say, the last 3 years prior to the time the excess-profits tax goes into effect.

I do not think it is necessary to go into various questions which have arisen and will arise again if we enact an excess-profits tax on the basis of invested capital. I call attention, however, to the fact that on the basis of invested capital the corporation cannot even have considered—that was the rule under the old acts—its fixed indebtedness, money borrowed upon its bonds, money which really went into the operations of the corporation, borrowed for that purpose; but it was limited to a narrow consideration of the capital invested, plus some other minor things.

I take it that when Canada, Great Britain, France, and even Germany—all of which countries have adopted the excess-profits tax—have abandoned, if indeed they ever had, the capital-invested theory as a basis upon which to impose these higher taxes, and have adopted a tax on the excess profits over and above the normal earnings over a fixed period, there is a substantial reason for that conclusion.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, would the Senator mind an interruption at that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. GEORGE. I do.

Mr. BROWN. I understand that one of the most difficult questions coming before those who are in charge of the purchase of implements of war for a national-defense program is how much money should be allowed on contracts the Government makes for amortization of the costs of the new tooling equipment that will be required; for instance, in the case of airplane engines, whether it should be over a 2-year period, a 4-year period, or an 8-year period. I am sure that in the period between now and the 1st of January those in charge of that program will have an opportunity to advise the Treasury and the committees of Congress as to that problem, which is one of the most difficult ones to solve in connection with our national defense.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Michigan is quite right. Not only is it one of the most difficult problems but it is one of the most important ones, because if we are relying upon private industry in this country to do the job of building the machines and furnishing the things necessary in our national defense they must, of course, be permitted to take amortization of their investment in additional plant facilities over a reasonable period of time. The amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin undertakes to do that, but on the basis of the amortization plan fixed in the old wartime act.

Now let me call attention to another fact, and it is a very important consideration: Not only are we not going to have tremendous war profits; the chances are that on the whole we may have tremendous war losses.

In the next place, let me call attention to the fact that now we are limiting the profits on the purchases under contracts made by our own Government. Let me show that under existing law the contractor who builds a vessel, or who works upon a ship, or an airplane, has a limitation fixed on his profits. I express the hope that before we are through this session those profits may be somewhat reduced, because I think they are somewhat excessive.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I am very glad to hear the Senator say that. The committee has been laboring on that very proposition.

Mr. GEORGE. I believe the limitation of profits is 10 or 12 percent now, is it not?

Mr. WALSH. Yes. The statistics show that in the year 1938, when there were not many contracts, the companies which were building our ships and our airplanes made profits reported of between 14 and 24 percent. That was in 1938, the year for which the last figures are available.

First, I want to compliment the Senator for raising his voice, which means so much in this country, because of the confidence and the respect the people of the country have for him, in protesting against the possibility of our going into this world war. It is refreshing and comforting to hear that, in view of the statement of a former Secretary of State last night, in which he was practically advocating our entrance into the war.

Would the Senator differentiate between profits on munitions and profits on general business or general earnings? I ask him that question for the reason that the Government is about to spend billions of dollars—not millions, but billions. The Navy Department now has on its desk contracts for building ships amounting to a billion dollars. I ask the Senator whether he does not think that, with the Government spending vast sums for defense, in preparation for war, and since we may have universal military training, and at the same time may be calling out our State militias from their workshops and their homes at a compensation of from $12 to $30 a month, and at the same time we are attempting to cut down salaries, and, if not cut them down, then eliminate or reduce the number of employees, whether we should not put some restrictions upon the profits made in the expenditure of the enormous sums of money which are being spent for munitions?

Mr. GEORGE. I thoroughly agree with the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. I thought the Senator would.

Mr. GEORGE. I not only agree with the Senator, but I think we must have an excess-profits tax upon the earnings of corporations.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. For the benefit of the Senator, I will say, with reference to the Vinson-Trammell bill, that this year three million and a half dollars already have been repaid into the Treasury of the United States, and one shipbuilding company in New England has this year set up a reserve of two million and a half dollars against excess profits to be returned to the Treasury.

Mr. WALSH. The profits I referred to are not entirely upon Government contracts. They are to concerns which have Government contracts, but the profits I refer to, namely, 14 to 24 percent, are on their entire business, which includes Government and private contracts.

Mr. GEORGE. I was merely pointing out that the present situation is that we now have limitations on what may be earned on contracts, and I am pleased to hear the disguished chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs say that he thinks those profits should be reduced.

Mr. WALSH. And we are seeking to reduce them, but meeting with vigorous opposition. I am sure we will find helping us the Senator from Georgia, when the bill is before the Senate, but we are having opposition from sources from which we did not expect it.

Mr. GEORGE. I appreciate that. Another thing to which I was about to call attention was that the excess-profits taxes during the World War were written on corporate income taxes, and the maximum tax was only 10 percent. Under the pending bill the rate upon corporate net income is actually 20.9 percent, more than double. So, with a tax of 20.9 percent upon corporate income, with limitations beyond the limitations which were imposed during the World War upon the profits made out of war industries, exclusively out of war contracts, and with the certainty that we must reconsider the tax question at the very latest by January 1, because no one can prevent consideration on and after that date, there would seem to be wisdom in allowing the committees of the Congress to consider thoroughly the proper basis of the excess-profits tax, not that anyone who looks at facts as they are can think for a moment that we could escape it, or try to escape it, or should have any desire to escape it, but that we must levy it, and must make it retroactive over the whole year 1940.

Let me say that there are many complications involved in the old tax which the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin has offered. If it were possible to do nothing else, I would gladly say yes, we must take it, but there are so many complications involved, so many difficulties involved, and in some instances so many injustices which may, upon a fair study and fair consideration, be ironed out, that I think at this time we should be willing to say to the Treasury Department, "If, as you say to us, you will be able, when you have collected the full data, which will take you about 60 days, to give us the basis upon which we can study this question, then we will proceed to a consideration of the levying of additional taxes, specifically the levying of excess-profits taxes."

Mr. President, I have not undertaken to point out the difficulties which were involved in the old excess-profits tax which the Senator has offered here, but to point out only one or two of them.

As I take my seat, I wish to say that between the Senator from Wisconsin and myself there is absolutely no difference. It would not be fair to leave this tax bill as it stands without widening it out in more respects than one, making the wider distribution of the tax burden upon all of our taxpayers, and especially upon all those who are most able to bear the burden of the taxes. I fully agree with him. I agree specifically that the excess-profits tax should be levied to apply to all the business done in this country in 1940.

Perhaps my views would not prevail, and perhaps the Senator's views would not prevail altogether. But, in the counsel we can have in a committee here and on the other side of the Capitol, I feel sure we can work out a good tax program, so far as the excess-profits taxes are concerned.

I wish to say again that it may not, I think, be fairly anticipated that any extraordinary war boom, save in the war industries themselves, is likely to come to this country as a result of the war. With one of the Allied Powers already out, with the other fighting a defensive war, and only a defensive war, from necessity, with arrangements already made for the purchase of cotton and wheat, food supplies, and even tobacco, from countries other than the countries in the Western Hemisphere, it need not be anticipated that any great war boom can come to the general industries in the United States, and whatever does come will be confined very largley, so far as its direct effect upon the war industries themselves is concerned, upon the people who build the planes, the engines for the planes, the parts for the planes, the ships, and who provide the guns and the ammunition to be used in the guns, in our own national defense.

I do not think one need to look further than to the enormous losses which have occurred upon the American stock market since that day in April, I believe it was, when the German armies marched into Denmark, through Denmark and into Norway, and give reasonable consideration to that situation without knowing that we are not in for any great boom. We are in for a period of hardship. We are not in for a great boom because the war will not extend to the Western Hemisphere. We are not going into that war. The war will end where it now exists. Woe be unto any political party which will make the election of next November a referendum on the question of peace or war. We need not worry ourselves greatly about that.

I am in full accord and in full agreement with the Senator from Wisconsin. I should like to appeal to him to let us have the opportunity to get the data and make the study because I know he wants a tax program, so far as excess-profits taxes are concerned, that will produce the greatest amount of revenue and at the same time be fair to the taxpayers themselves and to the general business of the country. I do not think there is any doubt now that Congress will remain in session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words in reply to the statement made by the able Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE]. I never claimed perfection for the amendment. I made the statement repeatedly in the present discussion that I recognize that it is a complex question, and that undoubtedly any excess-profits tax enacted now or next fall or next winter or a year from this summer, will have to be revised after it has been on the statute books, and we have had some experience under it. But, Mr. President, if the Treasury takes the position and furnishes the ammunition against any proposed tax on excess profits merely because it thinks it has not yet had a chance to draft a perfect amendment, I will say that we will never have an excess-profits tax, for neither the Treasury experts nor the experts of the joint committee will ever be able to draw an excess-profits tax or any other kind of a tax amendment that will be perfect in character.

I am not proposing this as a temporary windfall tax. I am proposing it as a permanent part of our tax structure, and, for that reason, I believe invested capital is the only sound basis upon which the tax can be predicated.

It is true that the taxes in Great Britain and in Canada are predicated upon a base of average earnings over a period of years, but, as I understand it, those are temporary excess war profits taxes, and I am not offering such a proposal here.

I think that one of the greatest sources of difficulty under the 1918 and 1919 and 1921 statutes has been eliminated in this amendment by taking away from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue the alternative methods of arriving at invested capital and forcing him to come to a determination. It was due to those alternative provisions that much of the complicated litigation arose under the taxes of those years.

So far as I am concerned, I hope the amortization provisions which are to be written into an excess-profits tax, if and when we ever get around to it, will not be drawn to suit the armament manufacturers. I believe that the amortization provision contained in this amendment is generous and equitable. It even goes so far as to provide for a readjustment of the amortization if, in the discretion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, an unfair amortization schedule has been arrived at.

Mr. President, I realize that with the opposition of the Treasury and the opposition of the majority members of the Finance Committee to this amendment, I am swimming upstream; but I wish to say as emphatically as I know how that there is no excuse for passing this tax bill at all if it is intended to commence a general revision of the tax law this summer or early this fall. The testimony of the Secretary of the Treasury and of Mr. Bell before the Finance Committee demonstrates clearly that there will be no urgent necessity for increase in the debt limit before next January.

If we are to pass retroactive tax legislation next winter or next spring or next summer, then why impose these increased taxes upon the individual taxpayers? Why impose them on the corporations? They are not going to pay any of their money into the Treasury until next year. If we are to adopt retroactive taxation on excess profits, we can adopt retroactive taxation on individuals and on corporations.

If this amendment is not to be attached to the pending bill, the bill should be stripped of everything except increase in the excise taxes, which should go into effect on the 1st day of July, and we should go right to work on a comprehensive revision of the tax statutes. But, if that is not to be done, if we are going to anticipate these increases upon the individual taxpayer, then I say that my amendment should be attached to the bill.

If we tax everybody to the bone and fail to tax the excess profits of corporations, those who wish to go home and explain by saying "We will tax corporate excess profits at some later time, or at some other time" are at liberty to do so. I say that now is the time to enact this amendment and let it go upon the statute books. If it develops in practice that it is imperfect, there will be opportunity for amendment. Even when the gentlemen in the Treasury get through working upon their perfect amendment, and the committee and the Senate swallow it and put it on the statute books, if it stays there any length of time, imperfections will be found in their efforts, and amendments will have to be made to it.

Mr. President, we have had experience under this principle of taxation. It was on the statute books after consideration by the Ways and Means Committee and the Finance Committee of the 1917 session, the 1918 session, the 1919 session, and the 1921 session. I say that it is no answer for Senators to rise here and say that this is a complicated question and that we will have to wait until the gentlemen from the Treasury Department have concluded their studies and rendered their Olympian opinions before we may act upon excess-profits legislation designed to spread more equitably the burden of this terrific tax that is being laid upon the people by making corporations pay in proportion to their ability to pay.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it not a fact that in the years preceding the last World War, and during that war, a number of excess-profits taxes were considered and enacted, but that in each case it was found that the tax was several months behind the profit? In other words, at the end of the last war excess profits and incomes had been stepped up to a very great degree. Nevertheless, the tax was always several months behind the taxpayer. Tremendous profits always accumulated before the tax could be considered and go into effect. Therefore it seems to me that the only way in which we can possibly make effective the pronouncement in the President's message the other night, and his pledge that in this war no war millionaires will be created, which, so far as I know, met with the commendation of every American, is by putting into effect at the earliest possible date an exces-profits tax. If the excess-profits tax proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin turns out to be not a perfect one—which I dare say it is not—the Congress, if it is in session, can change it at any time. Certainly the Congress which meets in January can change it. In the meantime we shall have a stopgap. We shall have an excess-profits tax which will run coincidental with the expenditure of the enormous appropriations we have been making. We have already made the appropriations. We did not say, "Wait until next January, when we come back here, and in the meantime we shall be enabled to work out more detailed plans for expenditure of the money."

We have appropriated the money. We have authorized its expenditure. We have already set in motion a train of circumstances likely to produce tremendous excess profits, but we are neglecting until a later time this session, or until the next session of the Congress, any legislation for catching the excess profits and keeping the whole burden from being borne by those least able to pay it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Missouri. It is a fact that the experience in wartime taxation clearly demonstrated that the Government was always behind in the enactment of legislation adequate to meet the tax situation.

I also wish to point out to the Senator that if this amendment is adopted and put on the statute books, corporations in this country will know something about what is to be required of them, whereas if the procedure recommended by the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Georgia, and the Treasury Department is followed the officers and stockholders of corporations will not know what to expect. I think all persons agree that uncertainty is undesirable.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. How would the corporations know in January what is to be required of them? The Senator proposes to make the tax retroactive to December 31. We can do the same thing any time up to March 15.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Of course we can; but if the tax is enacted now, corporations will know, for the period from July 1 to the end of this year, what is to be required of them, whereas under the procedure recommended by the Treasury and by Senators who oppose this amendment they may not know until the entire corporate year has ended what is to be required of them, and then a retroactive tax may be imposed.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. First, I wish to apologize for not being present to hear the preliminary statement of the Senator from Wisconsin. I was somewhat disturbed by the statement of the Senator from Georgia, to the effect that the present proposal is in excess of any proposal made for excess-profits taxes during the World War. I should like to have the Senator point out the basis upon which he drafted his amendment. I apologize for asking, because I presume he did so earlier.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. My amendment allows corporations a return of 8 percent on invested capital plus $3,000, in the form of an exemption, before the tax is applied. Then a 20-percent tax is imposed on all net income (in excess of the exemption) up to 20 percent of the invested capital. A 40-percent rate is applied on all income in excess of 20 percent of invested capital. It is true that the corporate tax in 1921, when these rates were in effect, was only about 10 percent, instead of about 21 percent, as in the bill now pending before the Senate. But, Mr. President, I think these rates are equitable, because, as the Senator will note, we have started out by allowing an 8-percent return upon invested capital.

Mr. WALSH. Was that provision in the 1921 act?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Such a provision was in the 1921 act; but the Senator knows very well that 8 percent is now a very liberal allowance for a return upon invested capital, in the light of present interest rates.

Mr. WALSH. I have personal knowledge of that from my own small and limited investments.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In view of the emergency that now confronts us, I do not think anyone can contend that these rates are onerous or excessive.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I have tried to read the amendment. I am not very familiar with all the provisions of it. It is pretty hard to tell exactly what it does. Did I correctly understand the Senator to say that his amendment permits an 8-percent return before the excess tax which his amendment covers is levied?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes. It permits a return upon invested capital of 8 percent.

Mr. TYDINGS. Before the excess-profits tax he has now outlined—the 20 and 40 percent—is levied?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Plus $3,000, which is provided as a flat exemption to take care of the smaller corporations.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me see if I correctly understand the Senator. First of all, $3,000 of the profits would be exempted; then 8-percent profit on invested capital, above the $3,000, would be exempted, and then progressively his tax bill would begin to apply. Is that a correct general statement?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Above that point, up to 20 percent of invested capital, a 20-percent tax rate would apply; and a 40-percent rate on all net income for the taxable year in excess of 20 percent of the invested capital.

Mr. TYDINGS. So it would not only be possible to earn 8 percent, but one might make 10, 11, or 12 percent. Is that correct?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is correct. I have placed in the RECORD a table showing the imposition of the tax upon selected corporations.

Mr. President, in conclusion I admit that this amendment is not perfect. I admit that it might be worked over for many months and improved. It is not my fault that the Finance Committee would not give it any consideration. I was not the one "blitzkrieging" the tax bill through the Finance Committee, and disposing of the bill with 2 hours and 20 minutes of consideration. I was not in favor of the program of excessive speed. I felt that in view of the fact that the tax bill will produce only $225,000,000 of revenue by next January, and that none of the other taxes will go into effect before that time, we should strip the bill down to the increase in the excise taxes and go to work and do an adequate job upon this tax problem. But the majority of the committee, or perhaps the entire committee, so far as I know, with the exception of myself, chose the other course. They are imposing these taxes upon incomes and upon excises. They are jacking up taxes by this bill. I say there is no defense for not reenacting into law an amendment which previously produced a great deal of money and worked reasonably well.

If inequities develop, if the perfectionists in the Treasury Department come forward with their Olympian plan, the tax can be modified and amended before the taxable year is concluded, if the Senator from Georgia is correct in his prediction that we are to continue working on the tax question during the summer and fall. Wise as I think the Senator from Georgia is in many respects, however, I do not share his confidence that we shall have any such result. In my opinion, we shall have the tragic repetition of what we have had before in these tax matters, and perhaps the whole year will go by before we again have any tax legislation considered by the Senate.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays upon this amendment, because I should like to see how Senators will go on record on this vital question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. On that question the yeas and nays are demanded. Is the request seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not know that I would have anything to say were it not for the fact that I feel some responsibility for having brought about castigation from the Senator from Wisconsin for having put some speed behind this legislation. I have no apologies to offer for it. I am glad we did it.

I am sorry to keep Senators here tonight; but we all know that one of the most beloved Members of this body is at the point of death. God knows we all hope and pray he will recover; but if he should pass away, and we should not hold this night session, and the bill should go over, there would be an adjournment of the Senate in memory of that Senator. Then later we should have to go back into the consideration of the bill with a great deal of argument and talk. Then the bill would go into conference, say, for a day, and then the question would come up of recessing next week to allow Senators on the other side who desire to do so to attend the Republican Convention. They are entitled to attend the convention. They did us the courtesy some time ago of permitting us to go to our convention, and I am in favor of their going to their convention. In the meanwhile it would be necessary to recess for a week, and this matter might be agreed on in conference, but the Senate would not be in session, and some of the taxes imposed in this bill would begin to operate on the 1st of July.

We ought to pass this bill before Saturday night in order to get the little pittance of revenue which some Senators say the bill will produce. I do not think it is a little pittance. I think the bill is a great job. Of course it is not perfect work; but we had to prepare the legislation in order to assure the taking care of our national defense.

The bill is not a perfect one, but it provides for the largest peacetime increase in taxes in the history of the country—$1,007,000,000. People may laugh at it, they may scorn it, but it is a pretty good tax bill after all. So it ought to begin to operate as soon as possible, and that is why I have asked the leaders and other members to stay here tonight.

Mr. President, we should have been delighted if, in the short time accorded to us, we could have gotten together on an excess-profits tax; but, as has been stated by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], we were told that the experts of the Treasury did not under the circumstances have time to draft such a tax proposal. I believe in having work on proposed tax measures done by tax experts who know the job. I want to see such measures free from any loopholes. I want to see every possible improvement made on the old excess-profits tax. While I know that the Senator from Wisconsin thinks his handiwork should be adopted and is the best possible proposal, yet we may be able to improve on it. I do not think there is any doubt about it, for every Senator here knows that there ought to be an excess-profits tax at least on those who make unreasonable profits out of the manufacture of war materials; and I am ready to go beyond that. The Senator will sit in the conference; he will be a member of the conference committee; and everyone I know of wants to see a reasonable excess-profits bill. I think his amendment will be greatly improved on, and the tax proposal will be written by experts and passed on by them.

There is no reason why it should be January before this matter is taken up and acted upon. I thought for a while we were going to be able to adjourn by Saturday night. I can see now that there is no possibility of it. Probably we shall reach an agreement on a recess. As soon as the data are given to us by the experts, if some of us have any influence at all, we shall get together on this question and submit a proposal to the Congress and enact it into law.

I hope Congress will stay here. I do not have to go home. I am like my friend from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST]. I agree with him when he says he thinks his duty is here during this emergency. He and I feel alike about that question. Therefore, we are going to do this work just as quickly as we can. I feel sure almost everybody will be satisfied by the excess-profits tax which will be submitted and finally worked out. One of the first things the President suggested was to try to impose an excess-profits tax. We went to the Treasury officials, and the experts there said, "We cannot get it up and ready for consideration by the time the Republican Convention is to meet."

So that is the explanation. I see no reason why every Senator cannot vote against this amendment, because we are giving the assurance that we will bring an excess-profits tax proposal into Congress; we will have it before us, and will pass upon it, in my opinion, before January.

That is all I desire to say.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I feel embarrassed about trying to detain the Senate at this late hour, yet I cannot help giving expression to one or two thoughts which have come into my mind after listening to this debate.

It is admitted that this amendment is imperfect. It is also admitted by the chairman of the committee that the bill itself is imperfect. We all know that. We are not going to have a perfect bill. We ought to strive as nearly as possible to attain perfection. That may be the ideal. We shall never reach it, as every human being knows who has had any experience in life.

Mr. President, I realize, what I think is apparent to all of us, that many logical reasons can be given against a retroactive law of any kind. State constitutions, as a rule, provide that no such law shall be passed. I realize that that objection to some extent may be offered against this amendment; but the remedy which is offered is to wait until next year and then make the tax retroactive for the entire present year. That makes it worse than ever.

We know what we are going to encounter, and we know that honest men in business, owning corporations, are going to meet with hardships if they have to pay taxes over a back period. That is true. We cannot get away from it, and will have to meet that argument. It will be doubly important next January. At least for the remainder of this year corporations will be on notice, as they should be on notice, and it is fair that we give them all the notice possible, just as we do in the case of individuals.

Mr. President, we could do the same thing about income taxes in regard to making them retroactive. I submit to the Senate that if the argument for postponing the amendment, and adopting it next year, and making it retroactive, is good logic, we should strike out every income tax in the bill and say we will adopt it next year and make it retroactive:

Why are there any income taxes provided in the bill? Could we not just as well make them retroactive? We are not going to collect them this year, we are going to wait until next year to collect them; and if we are keeping out corporation taxes with the intention of making them retroactive when we pass the contemplated bill next year, we can do the same with income taxes.

Mr. President, I commend the Senator from Mississippi on his expedition. I am not finding fault with him. I think he has done a good job, but it is not quite good enough. There is no reason why, as I see it, we should put this increased burden of taxes upon the individuals and not upon the corporations.

We have had a great deal of experience in investigating and in talking about and in legislating on excess-profits taxes. When the great World War was on there was started in the Senate a fight by an organization for the purpose of providing for an excess war-profits tax. We were laughed out of the Senate. All the amendments offered by different members of the organization were defeated. In a year or two, however, the Congress imposed an excess-profits tax, but the excess profits had been made and were beyond the jurisdiction of any law of the United States, and we did not get very much of a return from it. We have had it agitated ever since. Members of Congress are in favor of it, but they say, "Let us wait until tomorrow before we put it on. Impose it on the other fellows, but let the corporations go free."

Mr. President, at the present time we are reminded that it is the duty of every American citizen to be patriotic. We are advised that the people are willing to be burdened with greater taxation in order to meet the problems of today. Cannot the corporations be patriotic also? Shall the burden fall mainly upon those whose incomes are at least moderate, and must we permit the corporation to escape entirely from paying an excess-profits tax?

The excess-profits-tax provision, properly drawn, gives exemptions, as the pending amendment gives an exemption of 8 percent, plus $3,000. That is an exemption which should satisfy any man, however greedy he may be to make money. Eight-percent profit, free from the excess-profits tax, should be enough to satisfy even the conscienceless corporation, as well as the individual.

Three thousand dollars to a small corporation, in addition to 8 percent, means a little exemption. So that they would always have 8-percent profit before the excess-profits tax would go into effect—8-percent profit on invested capital, plus $3,000.

Mr. President, we should not delay a moment putting this amendment on the statute books. It is a just tax; it is a fair tax; it permits the corporation to make more money than the average individual or businessman in the United States can make upon any investment in any legitimate business at the present time. How would we feel if we had money invested, for instance, in United States bonds, drawing 2 percent or 3 percent, if we could get 8 percent before we paid any taxes? It seems to me it is liberal, and it is patriotic. We should, we must, tax our people until it hurts.

It is always hard to pay taxes. Every person desires to avoid the payment of taxes if he can do so legitimately, but we are now faced with such a condition that every patriotic American citizen knows he has to pay taxes, that it is patriotic to do it; that the taxes must be increased, and when we impose an excess-profits tax on a corporation which shall not begin to operate until the corporation makes 8 percent on its invested capital, we are exceedingly liberal. The corporation should thank God that it is not necessary to go further and to impose this tax on it after it has made 1 or 2 percent; but 8 percent escapes the excess-profits tax entirely.

Mr. President, I submit that under present financial conditions existing in this country this is an exceedingly liberal exemption. I see no reason why in passing the bill we should not impose this tax. The chairman of the committee stated that the bill itself was imperfect, and that is true. If we find some imperfection in it after it is in operation, we can correct it. Is not that true of every law Congress ever passes? Has anyone yet found an instance of perfection being reached? If we pass the bill now, we will find out its imperfections, if it has any, sooner than if we should wait until next January to pass it.

Mr. President, it seems to me it is the patriotic duty of Congress to put the pending amendment into the law.

Much has been said about hurrying this matter along because of the desire for adjournment of Congress. Most Senators have expressed themselves as being opposed to adjournment. They want to stay here. The patriotism of those who feel that Congress ought to adjourn has even been impugned by Senators on this floor. I know Senators do not mean to impugn my patriotism merely because I want to adjourn. Other Senators who think we ought to adjourn are just as patriotic as those who want to stay here during June, July, and August and sweat it out here.

Mr. President, when we shall have passed the pending bill, the appropriation bills, and the other bills that are necessary to be passed in order that defense preparations may proceed, I think we ought to adjourn. I believe a paramount reason why we should adjourn is that, in my opinion, it would have a tendency to keep us out of the war. Of ccurse, no one wants to take a step which would lead us into the war. I do not believe there is a Senator who is in favor of our going to war. But if we stay here after we have done our work and keep on talking and talking, we may draw a picture which will only make the people of the United States hysterical and cause them for some reason or another to think that if Congress should adjourn we would go to war the next day. If we will stop talking, keep our feet on the ground, not get hysterical, and when we have finished our work, adjourn and go home, I think we will get along with less provocation toward involvement in the war.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, it is my purpose to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin. I realize that the amendment may not be perfect, but I shall vote for it because of the total inadequacy of the pending bill to raise revenue. Earlier in the day I called the attention of the Senate to the fact that in the calendar year—in the next 6 months this revenue bill will provide only $216,000,000 of new revenue. Yet we know that we are faced with very colossal expenditures for national defense.

Another reason why I shall vote for the amendment is because all effort to economize has been stricken from the bill. It was stricken by the motion made by the Democratic leader of the United States Senate. I say here and now that the Democratic Party must answer to the people of America for the failure to reduce expenditures, nonessential expenditures, nondefense expenditures, and divert this money to the essential purpose of national defense. The defeat of the economy amendment lost $500,000,000 in savings and I feel compelled to vote for new taxes to this amount.

Mr. President, if we spend $5,000,000,000 for national defense, and we certainly should not spend less than that in the coming 12 months, we will have a total expenditure of $12,000,000,000. With this present bill the revenues will be only six and one-half billion dollars, and we shall have a deficit of five and one-half billion dollars, the largest peacetime deficit in the history of the American Nation.

I propose to vote for the amendment because I think that the revenue which will be produced by it is necessary to pay for the national defense, and secondly, I think it is necessary to make the people of America tax conscious, make them realize that these enormous expenditures and appropriations that are being authorized in Washington must some day be paid out of the pockets of the American people.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HILL (when Mr. BANKHEAD's name was called). I announce that my colleague is absent on public business.

Mr. CHANDLER (when his name was called). I have a pair on this vote with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY]. I do not know how either of those Senators would vote if present. I vote "nay."

Mr. HOLMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. STEWART]. I do not know how he would vote on this question. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER]. I am not informed how the senior Senator from Virginia would vote. However, I am informed that the senior Senator from North Dakota, if he were present and voting, would vote as I shall vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS of Utah (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES]. I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW], the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT], the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SLATTERY], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. STEWART], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS] are necessarily absent from the Senate.

Mr. AUSTIN. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], who would vote "yea," is paired on this question with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SLATTERY], who, I am advised, would vote "nay."

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] is absent because of illness in his family.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] is absent on official duties.

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 31, as follows:

YEAS—41

Ashurst	Hughes	Minton	Thomas, Idaho
Bone	Johnson, Colo.	Murray	Thomas, Okla.
Byrd	La Follette	Neely	Truman
Capper	Lee	Norris	Tydings
Clark, Mo.	Lodge	Nye	Wagner

Bridges	Donahey	Johnson, Calif.	Vandenberg
Bulow	Frazier	King	Van Nuys

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLT subsequently said: Mr. President, I was necessarily absent during the vote on the La Follette amendment. I ask that the RECORD show that, had I been present, I would have voted "yea" on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee has the floor. To whom does he yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.
